people, both in Africa, and in Sicily. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being farre aduanced before the grolle of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Roman hauing alio with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discouered the approach one of the other, Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gauls, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betwene their troopes, to assit them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to trie the mettall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, shrinke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gauls maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as presuming that they were well backed. Neither was the Consull vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardinesse deseruing his aide; and the hasty flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he aduentured himselfe so farre, that he received a dangerous wound; and had bene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward furnamed Africagenous) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian. Whilst the Romans were busied in helping their Consull; an unexpected storme came driving at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compasse them about, whilst hee with his men at Armes sustained in charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ronne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and iowred: so that they all betooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisdome, hauing lost to many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extreamest of the tempest ouertooke him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, he in a manner stole the retreat, and recovered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Heerein hee followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quandoq; dubium videatur, lucitanti miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort: If a Generall of an Armie, by some vnprosperous beginnings doubts the successe; or find his Army fearefull or wauering; it is more profitable to steale a safe retreat, than to abide the vncertaine event of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the Riuer; Scipio the whilst refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Campe; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, now issued forth to forsake him. They thought that now the long desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Amerestus, Brutus, Marus, and Gessates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman Campe; wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruice. Hannibal received them exceeding courteously, and dismist them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vse to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following; the Consull stole a retreat, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him, and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, save some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the Riuer of Trebia, and salue themselves. Scipio, being both vnable to trauaile by reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Consull; incampes himselfe strongly vpon the banks of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For euery day, more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the Boji, that brought with them the Roman Commisioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens & pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Clasidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a desire of hastie reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse received; seeing that in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore halted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicily, awaited his coming. Hee therefore halted his her; and from thence he marche d speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being ioyned in one, the Consuls deuised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiving from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal arrived; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gauls.

Sempronius, hauing received from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts, sought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victory, which hee had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. Hee also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-neere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; obiecting the vnskillfulness of the new-come Souldiers: and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him that the Gauls, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the Riuer of Trebia, and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both quidd and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonor which he might otherwise easily haue auoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; hee no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impacience of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls inhabiting neere vnto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might haue done; although hee daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to let them at libertie, hee had vnderaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, hee was bold to be his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as hee needed of that which they had. Heereupon they flic to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to ioyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: hee suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutabilitie. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honor of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering iniurie: and that thereby might be wonne the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore hee sent out a thousand horse: which coming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his foragers, and finding them heauy laden, cut many of them in peeces, and chased the rest euen into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster then they came. Sempronius was readie to backe his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victorie (for so the Consull would haue it called) made the Romans in generall desirous desirous to try the maine chance in open field : all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduertised by the Gauls, his spies, that were in the Romane Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces : He found in the hollow of a water-courfe, ouer-grown with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, hee had sent ouer Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse : to braue the enimie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunitie to fight : and therefore not only issued out of his Campe, but forded the Riuer of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day, his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes : which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Laines : hauing of the one, sixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse : thrusting their light-armed, and Darters, in loose troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equal to their enemies ; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants ; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush : then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies swords, and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of sixe and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which euery one deserved to be recompensed with the losse that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferior in horse, and withall thereby subiect to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-euen grounds and wood-lands, would haue beene of no vse. His second error was, that he made no discouerie of the place vpon which he fought ; whereby he was grossly ouer-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee dencht his footmen with emptic stomackes, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a most cold and frostie day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perillous, than to present an Armie tyred with trauaile, to an enimie fresh and fed ; since where the strength of bodie faileth, the generosities of minde is but as an vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got thence with into Placentia ; Realing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceiued him not, because of the showres ; or would not perceiue him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreame danger, flying through the Countrie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. He was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight ; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enimie had met with him. Neuerthelesse hee got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following : and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gauls into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul slain ; & his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

THE Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vnfit for seruice : to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Ceremonia. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet : but vexed them with continuall Alarmes ; assailing diuers places ; and taking some ; beating the Gauls their adherents ; and winning the Egyptians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Romane Quæstors or

Treasurers, two Colonels and fise Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loaden with yrons, and miserably fedde : those of their followers he not onely well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome ; with this prolation, That hee therefore vnderooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gauls were not capable of such perswasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countrie the seat of Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and walking their Territories. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life, others admonished him of the danger : and these that gaue him the aduice, were readie soone after to practise against him ; but were in like sort detected. Hee was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that hee might not bee descried, nor knowne, to those that should vnder take to make him away. Faine hee would haue passed the Appenines, vpon the first appearance of Spring ; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had fedde more Swallows than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre neerer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls, more seruicable friends, abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Romane Armies found no memorabile impediment, in their marches that way : the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was trauielling through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all waies foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iourne. Neuerthelesse to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not probably be thought to haue beene erected vpon the ordinarie passages towards Rome : he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Penes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, hee losed all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes ; by the moistnesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe myre and water. In briske, after he had with much adoe recovered the firm and fertile Plaines, he lodged about Arretium : where hee somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, & Cn. Seruilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this yeere : Seruilius, a tractable man, & wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate ; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator ; who hauing once been robbed (as hee thought) of his Consulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be serued to againe, vnlesse hee quickly finished the warre. This iaculous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome ; when hee entred into his Office, left his aduersaries, by sayning some religious impediment ; should detain him within the Citie, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that he hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore hee departed secretly out of the Towne ; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeated with this, reuoked him by Embassadors ; but he neglected their iniunction ; and hastning to meet with the Carthaginians, tooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierce disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. There fore hee prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman : hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, etc. Seruilius came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countrie betwene Fesule and Arretium he put to fire and sword, euen vnder the Consuls nose ; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had bene quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath said, Plus çaite n'est pas perdu ; A wasted Countrie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to bee much impaired ; and therefore advanced towards the Enimie. Many aduised him (which had indeed bene best) to haue patience a while, and tlay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare : saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians went burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore hee tooke horse ; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stucke so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tullie makes a least: saying, that the cowardlie knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weake to lift it: asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their ieaousie both hee, and the Senate that did giue him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thrasymene; was on a light fire, which whilest the Consull thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal to vnadvisedly, that hee fell with his whole Armie, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betwene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was hee charged vnawares, on all sides, (saue onely where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flee from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was hee slaine in the place, accompanied with fiftene thousand dead carcases of his Countymen. About fixe thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard, tooke courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way recovered the toppes of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was wellswaged, when they ceased to despair, of losing their liues by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweate, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noise, but not any way discouering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable laughter of their fellows. But they staid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to bee gone, ere they were decied, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should haue thought vpon sooner; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For decied they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendering vp their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Heerein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter coucnants, or adde vnto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first baigne; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spanish Conquests; according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present aduantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as a Romane, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousefne gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fiftene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands: of which all that were not Romanes, hee set free without ranfome; protesting, as hee had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vnderaken this warre. But the Romanes he kept in straight prison, and in fetters; making them learne to eat hard meate. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but onely the preferring of her owne necke from the yoke of flauerie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two batailles. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Seruilus the other Consull, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but coming too late, hee increased onely the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this companie; companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yielded to mercie, the next day. Seruilus himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gauls, against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular ieaousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yeerely change of their Commanders in the warres; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errors, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to bee caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also be like forgotten, how Sempronius, feare to bee preuented by a new Consull, and ambitious of the sole honor of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrary to all good aduice, haue bene so hasty to fight, before the arrivall of Seruilus. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consull Flaminius neglected. We may boldly auow it, that by being continued in his gouernment of France 10. yeeres, Cesar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the German, vnder the Romane yoke; into which parts had there bene euery yeere a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, haue bene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Riues, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wife as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they began to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Gouernment, sitting the Countie, they haue bene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer bene the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their slothfull ignorance, by the olde examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither licensse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by limping Warre. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and aduanced by the People, for bold and successfull attempting, adventures rashly vpon Hannibal; and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

REcently were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than euer did war, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers, and so little, accustomed to receiue an ouerthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was strangely affected with his successe; and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee onely sought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie; demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which hee boomed with desire of reuenge. Tichnum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his ability. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bin out of vfe, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject vnto comprell of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but vpon some extreme, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consull (if he stood vpon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Conſull being dead, and the other too farre off, the People tooke vpon them, as hauing ſupreme authoritie, to giue the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the beſt reputed man of warre in the Citie. Novum ſcilicet, novum conſilium expeti. Contrarie winds, contrarie counſels. Q. Fabius choſe M. Minutius Rufus Maſter of the Houſe: which Officer was cuſtomarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The firſt act of Fabius, was the reformation of ſomewhat amiſſe in matter of Religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene alſo good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were conſulted, and gave direction in this buſineſſe of devotion; then muſt we beleue, that thoſe bookes of Sybil, preſcribed in Rome, were dictated by an euill ſpirit. For it was ordained, that ſome Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, ſhould be made anew, & amplified; as hauing not bin rightly made before: alſo that great Plaies ſhould be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with ſuch other trumperie. This vehemencie of ſuperſtition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And ſurely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly diſtempered with paſſion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that ſuddenly died, when they ſaw their ſons returne alieue from Thraſymene, may ſeeme to beare witneſſe; though it be more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuer were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it ſelfe. In this tumult; when the Dictator was newly ſet forth againſt Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian ſeete had intercepted all the ſupply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Againſt theſe Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruilium the Conſull to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ſhips about Rome and Oſtia, to purſue them: whileſt he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leuiſed in haſte: and from Ariminum he receiued the Armie, which Seruilium the Conſull had conducted thither.

With theſe forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal, not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horſe had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himſelfe on high grounds, and of hard acceſſe. Hannibal in the meane while, purſuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrey, and viſed all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants; eſpecially to thoſe of the Roman Nation, of whom hee did put to the ſword, all that were able to beare armes. Paſſing by Spoleum and Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick ſhores; and made his diſpatches for Carthage, preſenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the ſpoils that he had gotten. Hauing reſreſhed his Army, fed his horſes, cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horſe heels of the ſeratches, by waſhing their paſternes in old wine: he followed the coaſt of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northern Province of the Kingdome of Naples; ſpoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie: only he had aſſailed Spoleum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, preſently gaue it ouer. The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it ſpent, in a great ſiege. This the Proteſtants Armie found true at Poitiers, a little before the battaile of Moncouster; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at St. Iuan d'Angely. But Hannibal was more wiſe. Hee would not engage himſelfe in any ſuch enterprize, as ſhould detain him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care waſt to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was abſolute Maſter of the field, it would not be long ere the walld Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of batterie. To this end hee preſented Fabius with battaile, as ſoone as he ſaw him; and prouoked him with all manner of brauado's. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences, betwene Souldiers bred vp, euer ſince they were Boyes, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by ſome notable acts againſt the Romans; and ſuch, as had no other ſeen the enemy, than bin vanquiſhed by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginians to neere, as hee kept him from ſtragling too farre; and preſented the countrey from veter ſpoyle. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them firſt to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might ſit on his taile.

Now

Now Minutius had a contrary diſpoſition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardice and leare. But all ſtirred not this well-aduiſed Commander. For wiſe men are no more moued with ſuch noiſe, than with winde bruſed out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indilcretion, and danger, than to purſue miſfortune: It waiteth it ſelfe ſooner by ſufferance, than by oppoſition. It is the invading Armie that deſires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore ſuffered Hannibal to croſſe the Apennines, and to fall vpon the moſt rich and pleaſant Terriorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perſwaded, to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weak in horſe, he alwaies kept the Hills & ſoft grounds. When Hannibal ſaw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Townes ſtood firme for the Romans, whole Legions were in fight, though a farre off; he reſolved to reſt his Armie, that was laden with ſpoyle, in ſome plentifull and aſſured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he muſt piſſe along by the Dictators Campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Callicula, and Caſilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might iſſue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which he had already waſted, into places more abundant of prouiſion for his wintering. It was by mere error of his guide, that he firſt entred within theſe ſtreights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Caſinum, whence he might both aſſay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promiſes vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from coming neere it to prevent him. But his guide miſ-vnderſtood the Carthaginian pronounciation, and conducted him awy another way, from Caſinum to Caſilinum, whence Fabius hoped that hee ſhould not eaſily eſcape. Now began the wiſedome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory, without blows. But Hannibal reſolved this opinion, and freed himſelfe, by a ſlight inuention, yet ſeruing the turne as well as a better. In driving the Countrey, he had gotten about two thouſand Kine, whoſe horſes he dreſſed with dry faggors, and ſetting fire to them in the darke night, cauſed them to be driuen vp the hills. The ſpectacle was ſtrange, and therefore terrible; eſpecially to thoſe, that knew it to be a worke of a terrible enemy. What it ſhould meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumvent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when ſome of theſe fiery Monſters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore haſtily away, thinking that the enemies were behinde their backs, and fell among the light armed Carthaginians, that were no leſſe afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recovered ſure ground, without moleſtation: where he ſtayed till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with ſome ſlaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in ſkirmiſh: After this, Hannibal made ſemblance of taking his iourne towards Rome: and the Dictator coaſted him in the wonted manner; keeping ſtill on high grounds, betwene him and the Citie, whileſt the Carthaginian waited all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, forſaken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houſes for winter, and incamped vnder the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time paſſed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about ſome buſineſſe of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius, the Maſter of the horſe.

Minutius was glad of this good occaſion to ſhew his owne ſufficiency. He was fully perſwaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by ſubtiltie and ambuſh, which he thought himſelfe wiſe enough to prevent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that ſo earneſtly, as he was preferred by iudgement of the Souldiers, in worthineſſe to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this iollie of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had hee beene peremptorily forbidden to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whoſe command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which he held vndoubtedly his owne; and the loue of the Armie; and the friends that hee had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to ſue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer ſo haſtily. Hannibal on the other ſide was no leſſe glad, that he ſhould play with a more adventurous gameſter. Therefore he drew neere; & to prouoke the Romans, ſent forth a third part of his Armie to waite the Countrey. This was boldly done, ſeeing that Minutius incamped.

incamped hard by him : but it seemes, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two camps, which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wane from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not onely for his men, but for his horses, which he knew to be the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer : if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increafe his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrey at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruest. This aduantage Minutius wisely e'pied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers : who being disperfed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans tooke heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceived that it was meerly weakenesse, which held him within his Campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuertheless he did not such hurt, as hee had received.

For this peece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne Campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better, that the Roman Armie had recovered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne Campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euerie man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship : saying that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so ioyfull of a little good lucke; as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that hee would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise, and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator : speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euerie one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people : which Office warranted him to speak, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said hee) that this our onely Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to be wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consull all this while; Servilius is sent away on Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and hee, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds : (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoyle some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuie and suspicion) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoyle all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is euen this : He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sold Governement both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie, thus farre forth I will regard his honour : I will onely onely propound, That the Master of the House may be ioyned in equall authority with the Dictator, a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so inturious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace; both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignity, whose great power, had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terentius Varro, who the yeeere before had bene Praetor, was glad of such an opportunitie, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher, afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very balennesse. And now he thought the time was come, for him to giue a hard push at the Consullship, by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would: So he made an hot inuectiue, not onely against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, That it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them; in matter of Governement; That they sought to humble the Commons by poueritie, and to impoverish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume euerie poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise : and since they had found one, (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authority, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consull, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius : and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius : so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what fort he thought it best to diuide their authority : whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successiue, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should neuer be his superiour : Hee would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless he meant to doe his best, and taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and a halfe from the Dictator. Needefull it was (though Linie seemes to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two feuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto another, nor ioyned in Commission, but haue each entire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies : in which regard, one Campe shall not hold them both, without great inconuenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe successiue (as the two Consuls vsed) with Minutius, by turns. Hee saith that Minutius was very refractory, and so proud of his aduancement, that continually hee opposed the Dictator : who thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to diuide the forces betweene them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subiection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authoritie, loue nothing more, than to contest with it : as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countre lying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adioyning, had many, and spacious caues: able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot: thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouered. But left by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; hee made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduventure vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troups with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves, losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neerer, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiving a farre off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrey, than the disgrace which hee had wrongfully sustained, fought rather to approue himselfe by lasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to feele thereward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal rettyred: fearing to be well wetted with a shower, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius, by whose benefit he confessed his life to haue bene saued. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilst his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neuer within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corficans; passed ouer into Africke; and there negligently falling to spoyle the Countrey, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily; and (being forewarned by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consull, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

§. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces leuiued against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans prouisions in the Cattle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

With little pleasure did they chuse the poorer sort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were giuen to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeede preferred them from receiving a great overthrow: but he had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparence thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardice (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome: since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman General had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honorable to doe iust nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready euery man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his owne private losse, vpon the ill administration of the publike.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit over-weak, to make way into that high Dignity. But the

Comminallie were then in such a moode, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Whereinto helpe, he had a kinsman, Nibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vie the liberty of his place; in saying what hee listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeede with his two Legions, was likely to haue bene ouerthrowne, and was refused by Fabius with the other two: but had all bene ioyned together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius, when he commanded ouer all as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consull, the warre would neuer be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians, as had long since bene aduanced to honour by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meener sort, euer since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needfull to choose a Consull, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a mere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could with more, than to keepe it, by well deserving of them. By such perswasions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alleadged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successively, by the space of five dayes, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Vigiles, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited onely vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vse, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The aduantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed no more, than to slip five dayes, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well alluaged. Vpon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publickly declare themselves to seeke those Offices. But no deuice would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was beleued) of this meane, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, onely Terentius was chosen Consull: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary marke had stood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiency, and reputation, should be ioyned with him, as both Companion and opposit. So L. Aemilius Paulus, he who few yeeres since had ouer-come the Thyrians; and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobility to stand for the place: which he easily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good seruice; He, and M. Livius that had bene his companion in Office, were afterwards iniuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto iudgement: wherein Livius was condemned, and Aemilius hardly escaped. But of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grieuous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happy victory that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he

he would worke, and that he would aske no more, than once to haue a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, traualled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Seruilus and Attilius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuerthelesse, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, & weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Army which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to relute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised it is vncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and fixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercenaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing them somewhat euely ballanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and instructions were giuen to Titus Otilius the Pretor, which was to goe into Sicily, that he should accordingly passe ouer into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serue to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for seruice. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumius Albinus another of the Pretors, went against the Gauls, to reclaime that Prouince, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip the sonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing bene their subiect, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not knowne: only this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth began to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie, by the shifts that they were driuen soone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soeuer) would haue bene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauil about forfeiture for nonpayment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as possibly as they could, without incurring the necessity of a battaile. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successe for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other seruices, but was indeede the occasion, to draw on the misery following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him lodged about Cannusinum; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aside for all necessities, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canna: for the towne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not only furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vnlesse they would be troubled with farr carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, hee enabled himselfe to abide in that open Country, fit for the seruice of his horse: longer than the Romans, hauing so many mouths to feede, could well endure to tarry, without offering battaile, which he most desired. Of this mishap when Seruilus had informed the Senate, letting them vnderstand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would serue him to command no small part of the Countrey adiacent; it then seemed needfull, euen vnto the Fathers themselves, to aduence a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italie. Neuerthelesse, answer was returned vnto Seruilus, that he should haue patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as neede required.

When all things were ready in the Citie, and the season of the yeere commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their armie, set forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great solemnity: especially, whensoever they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemne Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good successe and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, (not onely such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for loue, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leaue-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Amilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honor, or likely to doe his countrey remarkable seruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens: a troupe no lesse in greatnesse, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to haue exhorted the Consull Paulus, with many graue words, to shew his magnanimity, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which hee thought harder) in bridling the outrageous follic of his fellow-Consull. The answer of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrey: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, hee would thinke it lesse ruinesse to aduerture vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Disfention betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was vpon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Canna.

THESE new Generals, arriving at the Campe, dismissed M. Attilius one of the last yeeres Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakenesse: Seruilus they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Amilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words: who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not onely now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their owne great numbers: which were no lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrey stood; how the state and safety thereof rested vpon their hands; vsing some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectuell part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour: but that onely by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Hee willed all he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill hee was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thicke mist, through the darknesse whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what aduantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helpes, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Amilius was knowne to be, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came short of them in all things else, saue craft; which would not alwayes thriue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should haue heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, hauing preconceived a victory, thought all delays to be impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembered what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Amilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forebare to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Confull Terentius; who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than he had beene in the Citie. Expectation is alway tedious; and neuer more, than when the Event is of most importance. All menlonged, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastned their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Amilius would fo too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeares prouisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Haruest? This would (said Varro) fauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably euery day. Amilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; he doubted not to fend them away in such haste, as they should not leaue run. <sup>2</sup> he doubted not to fend them out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaincs; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless he fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude wel-come and intertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell vpon the Roman Vantcoursers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilst it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troups weightrily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Amilius, who could not handliomely withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus, sending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lye vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselves. He neuer was more unwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground forced wholly for the advantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equal tearmes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessities: whereof an Armie foraging the Countrey, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Linie differeth much in his Relation from Pelzilius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had beene driuen; and of base courses that he deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. Hee had (saith Linie) but tenne dayes prouision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnuly Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaulle with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lacke of all other counsaile, he resolved to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early haruest. But whilst he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him to thar, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaigne ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Linie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had thus done passing well. Further also hee may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith; Hannibal de fugâ in Galliam (dicitur) agitasse; Hannibal (û said) to haue

haue brought himselfe of flying into Gaulle: where he makes it no more then a matter of heere-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the processe it selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaulle, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victuall enough, and all things needefull vnto his Armie, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great haruest; since he had long beene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surpris, no small part of the Romans prouisions? Sutable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but come and cataille; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie: and had so well increased his stocke, since he came into that Countrey, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with spoyle: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not ealie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Armie free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so doe, hauing not onely pronounced, That which of his men loeuer fought brauely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnely protested & sworn, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaulle, was a fencelesse deuice, Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrey and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now doe there with his horse? or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to liue, hauing betrayed all his Army; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitte; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Linie. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians loue to extoll their owne Countreimen; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honor of the victory taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blinde fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgouernment of their own forces: as if they might easily haue won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vse his owne authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he began to passe the Riuer, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to haue dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrey to a needelesse hazard. Against whose words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could alledge none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians, ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesse Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to assaile: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Amilius perceived, that hee could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Tenne thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leaue behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity hee was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight began, & taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesse Campe, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the Riuer, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed likewise, somewhat higher vp the streame, which ran from the South; leaving in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He had them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said hee) pray for any greater fortune, than to ioyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a leuell ground, where the stronger in horle aduantage to preuaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said hee further) ye are first of all to thank the gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them along, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their liues, where they are sure to loose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now ye may euencourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom ye haue as often beaten as scene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to driue them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Countrey, and fields of Italie; both of which ye haue obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers; and ere many houres passe, ye shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this: his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what work they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Atago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the sad moode of his brother with a iest, and shew himselfe merry vnto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discourer. But if Hannibal himselfe had bene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not haue returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the first: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Euen such words as these, or such pleasant iests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and vnder takings. For to omit the commodiouse of the place, into which he had long before conceiued the means to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where euery one might doe best seruice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdus; but when we vse our owne termes, the solonne hope. The grosse of his Armie following them, he ordered this. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more aduantage, than those wherewith they had formerly serued; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betwene these he ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Country manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules vsing long broad swords, that were forcible in a downe-right stroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell upwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse; the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple.

This

This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew, and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and furious in giuing charge, but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them haue inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to giue ground, when they were over-pressed; nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, serued mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence ioyntly vnto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spain, by their Conquests, and in Gaul, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamitie should fall vpon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to employ the vttermost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the Enemy could not presse farre vpon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great aduantage, which the Carthaginian had in horle: by which he was able, if the world had happened, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so liuely, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to aduance; leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should be ouerhardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent, He made them as it were his Vanguard; the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thin, as seruing onely to guide it orderly backe, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened and thickened against all impression. The circle hercof seemeth to haue bene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brass, as I haue scene of this Battaille, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were posted in the Rere, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driuen to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betwene the last ranks of his long battalions, and in the head of his Rere, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betwene the left battalion and the Riuer Ausidus, were the Gaules and Spaniards, vnder the command of Asdrubal. On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (hisie saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horle. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Rere. The whole sum of Hannibal's Armie in the field this day, was ten thousand horle, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies hauing two to one against him in foot; and Hee, fise to three against them in horle.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had bene found conuenient against the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long, as also to strengthen well the Rere, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might rally themselves. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battalions accordingly, as meeting to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their aduantage was in Horle, against which, this manner of embattailing was very vnprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flanke. As for Emilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wife men yeeld for very weakness vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the Riuer, were the Roman horle-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horle, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeeres Consul, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians hating their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

slingers of the Gauls: Asdrubal brake vpon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of seruice on horse-backe, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giuing on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron; as hauing the Riuer on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wherefore they not onely vsed their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from vnder them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they began to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouerborne, and driuen by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gauls and Spaniards, was not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horfemanship. When the battailes came to ioyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more then enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spanish foote make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Opposites were forced to disband, and flye backe to their first place. This they did in great haste and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and folly pursued. Vpon the Africans that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was void room enough; and forasmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retreat, or flight, of the Gauls and Spaniards, it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limbe or viter compass of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vnouched, onely turning round, and recoyling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe circle; which they should not haue needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vniuitingly engaged themselves deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so farre, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Herby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as couered the Africans; who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselves, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would haue beene so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines; but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed vpon them, along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless he cheered vp his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne stout behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better success. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weaknesse, to forsake his horse. company alighted, thinking that the Consul had giuen order so to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to helpe their foot in distresse. When Hannibal (for he was neere at hand) perceiued this, and vnderstood that the Consul had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would haue deliuered them vnto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was maruellously troubled by Hannibal or Maharbal and the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great sandy Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomarily, drate into the eyes and mouthes of the Romanes. These, vsing their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were euen ready to ioyne; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendered themselves. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had bene good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where hee bad them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty aduenturers did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Vnder their lackets they had short swords and ponyards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slaine, and therewithall flew vpon the hindmost of the Romanes, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischiefe, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the backe of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was giuen by the same hand which gaue the first. Asdrubal, hauing in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in pieces all, saue the Companie of Emilius that rushed into the grosse of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, between the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell backe behinde the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom he ioynd, and gaue vpon Terentius.

This fearefull cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme vnto those, vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine, thought it the best way, to auoid the danger by present flight. The Consull was no lesse wise than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in struing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shranke from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue endured with their assistance. Now hee found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome, and another, to incounter him. But of this; or of ought else, excepting hastie flight, his present leisure would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittest for that seruice. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gauls and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell vpon the backs of the Romanes; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else. Hee brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne. Heere began a pitifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whilest euery one sought to auoid those enemies, whom he saw accrest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got vp to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe, yet I will rather beleue it, than suppose that Emilius so reporteth, to grace thereby his Historie with this following tale. Cm. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, where hee saw the Consull sitting all blouded vpon a stone; entreated him to rise and save himselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it, willing Lentulus to save himselfe, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to bee brought into indignities by the People: either, on an accusation of his Colleague, or as guilty himselfe selfe of that dayes losse. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: writing them to fortifie Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling Fabius, that hee lined and died mindefull of his wholesome counsaile. These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaille, or when he beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul & his troupe, in little better case than if they had bene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeed as within a sacke; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottoome; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed vp the mouth: in which part, they first of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Amilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilest the battaille yet lasted, and whilest the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might haue withdrawne himselfe; was now (had he neuer so well bin mounted) vnable to flie, hauing in his way so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodics, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaille he fought no lesse valiantly, than he had warily before, both abstained himselfe, and dissuaded his fellow-Consull, from fighting at all. If, when the day was vtterly lost, it had liue in his power to saue his own life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much disesteemed himselfe; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his vnthankfull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Amilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lisle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsburie, who died in the Battaille of Chailillon, more highly to be honoured. For Amilius was old, grievously, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the ouerthrow receiued: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, vn timer, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when hee refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaille, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone and leaue him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, who (as Liuie saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about sixe hundred of them brake forth, and ioyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselves away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troupes, partly dispersed, into Cannusum: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeilded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: onely he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Amilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-neere done, the battaille was lost: and Hannibal, comming ouer the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeilded, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his victorious Armie, a greater number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the enimie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that hauing serued at Canna, were after wards extreemly disgraced by the State of Rome; for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Romane horse what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the Riuer; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companie. That hee was so ill attended, it is no maruell: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his nearest way thither, had bene through the midst of Hannibals Armie, if the passage had bene open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned vp some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted comre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but tooke other waies, and were scattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or thereabouts, were gathered vp by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all saue three hundred; who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led led them; and got into sundry Townes. There died in this great Battaille of Cannae, bo-sides Lucius Aemilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Questors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, foure score Senators, or such as had borne Office; out of which they were no be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall make, as hauing beene ediles, praetors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn.

Servilius the last yeeres Consul, and Minutius late master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaille, Lince makes no greater than three thousand foote; and three hundred horse: not few to haue defended for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman Camps; which yet the same Lince saith, to haue beene ouer-cowardly yielded to. We may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no lesse then eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemy spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about fiftethousand more, who yielded in the greater campe, when their com-panie were either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romanes, especially the consull Farta, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gauls, fiftene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not sensible, in the ioy of so great a victorie; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal aduised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had presently bene at an end. But hee beleeued not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therewith told, That hee knew how to get, not how to lose, a victorie.

Of things following the battaille at Cannae.

Of without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their trauailes, than the truth of things, and information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of sound iudgement will condemne this libertie of censure, which Polybius hath vsed. For, to recompence his iniurie, (such as it was) he produceth substantiall arguments, to iustifie his owne Relation; and censureth the vantage of those former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill co-hering: which paines it is to be suspected, that he would not haue taken, had hee beene borne in either of these two Cities, but haue spared some part of his diligence, and beene contented, to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserued, of his owne Countrey. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall haue some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that some Workes of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent.
 But since this cannot bee, wee must bee sometimes bold, to obserue the coherence of things; and beleue so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) faire probability. This attentue circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulnesse, which we finde in the best Narration, of things following the Battaille of Cannae. For it is said, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got into Cannusium, choosing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consull Terentius Varro, ioyning his company vnto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote vnto the Senate, that he had now well-neerettenne thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consull were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, that had beene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadors from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meete to send any, or without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a prettie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the

ouertthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutuell dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman campe, and trusted vp the spoiles, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpini, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Cossa, where hee laid vp his baggage: and leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hastned into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not onely in regard of their griuous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoyleing the Countrey, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vs'd, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Canna, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had sought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their loue by gifts; pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all waies and means, to make them his, whilst all other motives were concurrent. At this time also hee began to deale kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being provoked by iniuries, sought to right himselfe and his Countrey; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule; nor, which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to choosetwelve of their number, that should bee sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransom: and together with these, hee sent Carthago a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to seele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoop vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all, or most of them, since the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not onely wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceeuable hope, of changing their olde Societie for a better. Wherefore not onely the Sammies, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vnterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits; but the Campanians, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the state of Rome, and by many mutuell affinities therewith as strictly conioyned, as were any since the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not (as somethen thought) of all the Earth: and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrey, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like layes by their feathery, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the Maiestie of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was gouerned by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calpurnius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the coniunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their Citie to the Carthaginians, shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourne into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the necernesse of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindered them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, and free dismissing of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him him of all faithfull meaning, were driven to sit still in a great perplexitie: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize. The people holding so tender a regard of libertie, that euen the lawfull Government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppression; had now good cause to feare lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by helpe of the Romans, bring them vnder a more streight subiection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being ready to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made vse of, to serue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they late in Council, about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent to murder all the Senate, and after to ioyne themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and save them harmlesse. This hee spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People, and priuie vnto their designs. Having thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: Hee promised neuertheless to deliuer them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freele put themselves into his hands, offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leaue; He called the people to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as hee knew they would be glad to heare, hee told them, that these wicked Gouernours were surprised by his policie, and all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Onely thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should chooset a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the olde. So rehearsing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their iudgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Chooft then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Multitude, vnprovided for such soon election, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom hee thought fit. The men so nominated, were vnterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, baseness, and infidelity, or else euen because they were vnknown, and therefore held vnworthy. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, hauing bene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius recreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time bee spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtlesse) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for sauing all their lines. Neither did the Senate faile after this by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Will, who else were likely to cast them down: All the City being thus of one minde; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Canna, this impediment was remooued: and few there were, that would open their mouthes to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serue the Romans in the Isle of Sicily: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadors were sent vnto Tarentum the Consul; to see his present case; and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wherefoer they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the seruice of their State; and desired to know what he would command them: But the most basely lamented vnto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune; saying, that all was lost; and that the Campanians must now, not helpe the Romans; who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campanians against the Sammies. Hereunto he is said to haue added a foolish Iouectiue against Hannibal and his Carthaginians; telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcases, and to feed vpon man flesh, with such other stuffe, as onely bewrailed his owne feare. As for the Campanians themselves,

He put them in minde of their present strength: they hauing thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus hee dismissed them, prouder than they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship, whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in aduenturing to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, vpon these conditions; That the Campanians should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizens of theirs should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in War or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campanians three hundred Roman prisoners, such as themselves would choos, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honourable Citizen opposed himselfe earnestly: vsing, in vaine, many perswasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude, whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change olde friends for new acquaintance. This did hee, when they were lending Embassadors vnto Hannibal: and this also did hee, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the Towne: at which time hee gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon halsted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the wals too high, & was not well provided to lay siege vnto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italie and Rome it selfe, should be driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campanian, but a Traitor to the State: and vsd him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserued. This was granted: and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first coming, he kept putting to great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campanians: among whom; onely this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; heing assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, whilst he was at supper, the first night of his coming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the Towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other Townes therabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casert, and Acerra, were the Cities next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leaue all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the overthrow at Cannae: and the griefe of that losse was so general, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparant dangers. It was hard to iudge, whether the losse already received, or the feare of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to stint the noyle and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Couriers were sent sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal bookes, buried a liue two men and women Gauls and Greekes, in their Okemarket. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions; we may iustly thinke, that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Diuell. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards, for their own honor, (as hath beene of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassadour was sent to Delphi, to consult with the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers & supplications they might pacifie the gods, & obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer their great feare; though not seruing to giue remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Praetor Octacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if hee found it meet, to passe ouer into Africa. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian Fleet, that waited the Kingdom of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Isles Agates, which was in readines to set vpon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Prouince; if the Praetor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seeme strange, that all those of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giuing him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weale publique. But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtlesse) prouided wisely, for vpholding the generall reputation. If his coming into the Citie had renewed the lamentations and our cries of the people: what else would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednes, among those that were subiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thanks; they noyled abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Lucius would haue vs thinke, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleecue him not. It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would haue strucke off his head; as in few yeres after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a 1000. horse: though with much difficulty; as being in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator; and two Legions onely set downe, that had bin enrolled in the beginning of the yere for custodie of the Citie. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field; foure new ones of Prætextati, or striplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, & so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them 8000. sturdy slaves, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, That whosoever ought mony and could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the war. To arme these Cōpanies, they were faine to take down, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bin there set vp: among which, were 6000. Armors of the Gauls, that had bin carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this VVar. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannae, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captiues, audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be transformed at the publike charge; not onely the teares & lamentation of their poore kinsfolke, but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending

their fate; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former Warre) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the enemy; much was alledged against these who now craved ranfome: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It iustified not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to auoid the disbursement: whether it were for, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must wee regard it, that the 10 slaves which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ranfomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, deuised to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had bene seuerer; when as indeed they were futable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggerly. Herof it is no little prooffe, That Hannibal valked those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ranfome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price; whereat hee thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for slaves might haue bene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withall consider, that these private men did onely lend the selfe us 20 a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented so forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the War should be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would haue bene his Chapmen: but seeing he dealt onely for ready money, they chose rather to say, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like fault critic, vpon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was vsed toward the souldiers that escaped from that great Battaille. These were charged for hauing fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if euer) that which they call ragione di Stato may serue for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being drun to a miserable exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing iniuries to private men. 30 And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had serued at Cannae, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twenty yeeres in the Warres, or else were fifty yeeres of age; but vntill this Warre should be ended, how long soeuer it lasted, and that without reuward. The same thrifty censure, was afterwards laide vpon others, for their misbehaviour: but neuer vpon any man of quality, save only (a good while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cicilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brained fooles his companions; who being fought out of their wirtes, with the terror of so great a losse, were deuising, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed 40 by a Tribune of the People; neer the lesse it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent then the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with five and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weak estate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofis with a Fleet, ready to set saile for Sicily, hauing one Legion aboard his ships, and fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces hee 50 was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Cannae, hee sent these of his new Leuy to Rome, for defence of the Citie, and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusium: deliuering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were liketo be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginian, and knew not how to aoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberat about the articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore hee made great iourneys thitherward; and arrived euen time enough enough to preuent the Enemy. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by faire words, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie, Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyalty: had also a sure Haucen; whereby it stood in the lesse feare, of sustaining much inconuenience, by spoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrie. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, that Hannibal was Master of the field; which if he laid waste, all the poore people were vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude: and such talke vied some, that had little feare of their own priuate want or pouerty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chiefe; a stout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of 10 speciall marke, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done good seruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Cannae, and after much gentle vsage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberrall gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thanks hee could vnto so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought vpon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had bene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserued of the Roman state, had not repaired vnto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly 20 reputed for his personall valour, he made this Bantius to faile in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, wherof he had not presently aduertisement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence wherof they gaue him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he tooke by composition; and so returned backe againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, being 30 ouer-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bested, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but onely to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which he sought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there passed messages betwene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently 40 rise; and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, euen to find him busied within the Citie, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the walles; hee thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three feurall gates looking towards the enemy: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe 50 their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walles were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bade his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very wals; and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, wherewith Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected fallie the more 60 more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, wherewith like sort issued they of the new leuied Companies, vpon the enemies backs. The sudden terror was more auaileable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the brauest Actes performed in all that Warre; forasmuch as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning aboute

three score and ten of high Treason, whose heads he stricke off; and so leaving the Town in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went & encamped hard by about Suesula Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wisdome to lose time in perswasions, but laide siege vnto it, and began on all sides to close it vp. This terrified the People, who knew themselves vnable to hold out. There fore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded, they stole out by night, and left him the Towne empty: which he lacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Capline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling that an Enemy so neere should disquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It seemes, or rather indeed it is plaine, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated to the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army secke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the ioy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden eruption; witnesse chiefly, in what great feare they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that hauing three yeeres since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not crest-falln. At Caplinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towne, and held it. Five hundred of the Præ- 20 flines there were, and about foure hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaille at Canna, being sent by their seuerall States to the Campe: whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them, and sent them backe sorrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whose gouernment they liued happily. So came they all one after another to Capline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua. How that great Citie became the King-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Capline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Præflines and their fel- 30 lowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laide one for another, at last they flew all the Townesmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Capline were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themselves might haue bene reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place with st. th. vpon what honest reasons they surprisid it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more worke then hee expected. Diuers assaults hee gaue, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driuen to close them vp, and seek to winne them by famine. 40 T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher vp the River: who saine would haue relieved Capline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had giuen him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suesula could not come: his way being stopped by the ouerflowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the Dictator stayed his iourney, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like, that the Dictator carryed at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Capline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not aduenture to raise the siege. Barrels of corne were sent by night, floating down the River, 50 and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stucke among the Willowes on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantitie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustiaied the poore besieged men. At length when all foode was spent, and whatsoever grew greene vnder the Wall was gathered for Sallets, the Carthaginians ploughed vp the ground: whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and saide, That he meant not to stay at Capline, vntill the Rape were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content to grant them their liues at an indifferens ransom, which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Capline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; vnto whom he restored it. To the Præflines Souldiers great thanks were giuen, and louing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Præflin: which is no weake prooff, of the good estate wherein the Citie flourished, that were subiect to the Roman Government. This siege of Capline was not a little benefitfull to the Romans; as hauing long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise haue bene better spent. For Winter ouer-tooke him, long before hee could dispatch the businesse: which how to quire with his honour hee knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where hee refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

§. X.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

When Mago, the sonne of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canna; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the ioyfull message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chased, wounded, or slain; how the stout Romans, that in the former waire neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the onely good 30 Captaine, because he neuer durst aduenture to come to battaile; That, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slaine of them about two hundred thousand, and taken about fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among therest hee magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not onely (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe seat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had bin entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, 40 attending their supply. As for the waire, Hee said it was euen at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repaire their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrey; that so many battailes had much diminished his brothers Army: that the Souldiers, who had so well deferred, ought to be considered with liberrall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, corne, and other necessities; but that these things must be sent from Carthage: which the victory would require with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three 50 bulshels, or (as others would rather haue it) no more then one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the principall of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament.

Who so considers the former Punicke Warre, may easily finde, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull aduertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no maruella, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this ioy, Himilco, a Senator aduers to the faction of Hanno, is said to haue demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, Roman E- 100 Whether which the Romans might have bene found occupied, euen with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome it selfe, vntill such time as eury little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Prouince, then must Emporia have bene besieged and forced: which by reason of alliance with the Masilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the towne of Emporia was too strong to be wonne in halfe: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians, hauing not about foure hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gracians, though not o-

uer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this towne of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would haue bene a worke of little lesse difficulty, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had bene in effect none other, than to alter the seate of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, nere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to bee forborne; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans vnterly out of Spaine: whom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawne homie to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen so the Romans afterwards remoued Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeouored to change the seate of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spaine. But the priuate affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is necessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had bin somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were farre lesse honourable than the people of Rome: not only in gouernment of their subiect Prouinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their priuate interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony vsed toward their owne Mercenaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Canna; when gladly they would giue all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spaine.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly, or for the most part, vpon successe of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though wee must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Liuie, the tender loue of his owne Countrey, which made him giue credit vnto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his sake, beleue those lies, which the vnpartiall iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntuth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken with many miseries, they had begun to submit themselves vnto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set downe by Amilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any warre. These words, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouer liberrall. For in the treaty of peace betwene Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise hee would not talke of any composition:

Amilcar

Amilcar boldly bad him chuse, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the Armes, which his Countrey had put into his hands to vse against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custome vpon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar haue his will, and not to stand with him vpon point of honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who stily, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntuth; saying, that howsoever Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behated themselves as men that had no sence thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betwene Fabius (as also perhaps betwene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoever Liuie introduced Hanno, in one place, ioyning very foolishly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the hands of Agathis, with the great seruices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of he had had a like end; yet elsewhere he forbearth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Liuie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations: which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before Aldrubal the sonne of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

It hath bin shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gaul into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, left before him his brother Romus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foureteen thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had been allotted vnto the Consul, therewith to make warre in Spaine against Hannibal: who since he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio beleueed, that a good part of these his owne forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry some of the number backe with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remained in Italie all the time of his Consulship; which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many batailles, and with-drew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates, that we haue cause to wonder, how the enemy could so often find means to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrey from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily winne vnto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serue to arme the Naturals against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had reuolted vnto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Souldiers, amongst those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Warres; or seeing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if wee durst be bold to say it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great as they are set out by Liuie. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Liuie in his person, maketh an obiection, vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liuie for him, doth doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spaine: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Asdrubal being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battaile, saue only by the steepe descent of Rockes, ouer a great Riuer that lay at his backe, ranne away with all his money, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly towards the Pyrennees, and so toward Italy; vpon which he fell with more then thre score thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retreat, if hee should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away be- to 10 fore him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so haue they said to haue done in the last battaile between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Campe. Wherefore we can no more then be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdome to giue too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporis, an Hauentowne, not farre within the Pyrennees, retaining still the same name with little infection. That by the fame of his clemency, hee 20 allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vie his clemency, or he to giue such famous example therof, being a mere stranger, and hauing no vnderstanding in the Country. Yet is it certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better success, for that he seemed to haue none other end, than setting them at liberty. This plect availed with some: others were to be hired with money: and some he compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when hee had wonne a battaile against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that he remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances 30 neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Suppliants; Mais l'estem Pop. Rom. comiter consequent, which is, as Tulius interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Maiestie of the people of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indee an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditiosa Roma- ne, 40 of the Romans in subjection; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Barguntians; Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any slight occasion 40 would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore hee not onely appointed Hanno Gouverneur ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Province betweene Iberus and the Pyrennees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke hee gaue the Principall y<sup>e</sup> of their Country vnto Hanno and his Heires,) Hee made him not onely Lieutenant generall ouer the main matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferior Officers of their owne, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the coming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indifferently into the protection of others, that many 50 times proue worse then the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanots, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards, and French; as more sensible still of the present euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ranne by seeking to auoide it. This bad affliction of his Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein hee was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wonne it.

it. But Asdrubal hauing passed Iberus, and coming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a victory, rousing abroad in the Countrey; and with great slaughter draue them aboard their ships. This done, hee ranne vp into the Countrey, where he withdrew the Illegetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his Fleet: where hauing set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. Sothe Illegetes were compelled by force, hauing lost Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The 20 Austrian likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of siluer. During the siege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thousand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should without any cause remembered, become Carthagi- nian on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that 30 all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntarily ditiosa Roma- ne, subiect vnto Rome, should in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleue, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Illegetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilest himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Asdrubal backe to his ships, whence he durst not stirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leauing some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio 40 wonne, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for, through a deepe snow. As for the Lacetani, Illegetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they fought their owne benefite: helping the misdoers one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise vpon sense of iniuries received, or apprehension of more grieuous tyranny, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, harkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Country Lawes, and not vnder Gouvernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: euen from hencefoorth vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar; till when they were neuer thoroughly conquered.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians in fight 40 at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too farre on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, about one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates, in Spaine, are said to haue submitted themselves vnto the Romans, or giuen Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flee into the utmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Luciania. Yet it follows; that the Illegetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing easily vanquished the Illegetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his subiects, and had giuen him Hostages. These 50 tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battails; wherein hee lost fifteen thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and hence forward the two brethren jointly administred the businesse in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did hand 60 confiantly, without both feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the same Celiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal.

Asdrubal, Bellar, the Governour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be persuaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the onely way to get the fauour and hearty good will of the Countrey, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: persuading them, as hee had done Bellar, to make the Liberality their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much loue, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we finde, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can beleue so few. But since we finde no better certainties, we must content our selues with these.

The yeere following was like vnto this: Asdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's diuide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreate, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and five hundred horse, out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet; and provides euery way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, reuolt vnto the Romans: because they had been chidden the last yeere for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The reuolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischief, so that Asdrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assaile him, that they driue him, for very feare, to encampe himselfe strongly on an high peece of ground; whence hee dares not come forth to giue them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein he had laid vp all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countrey round about. This good successe breeds negligence, for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should leade his Army forth into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had beene informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we finde it reported: and that vpon the very rumour of this his journey, almost all Spaine was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so; or, if they will needs haue it so, that then they must send him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to employ they should finde worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needs be gone; Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that seruice both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of money, that he might haue wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembering to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he layes great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subiects: and hauing gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Riuer name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards healed into Italy. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were fully ioyned. Their Campe, the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionlesse) they are maruellously enriched; all the money that could be raked together in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes euent ioynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrey stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaues him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to Rome; and Letter to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they haue neither money, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting: so as vnlesse they may be supplied from

Liu. lib. 23.

Rout,

Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor carry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an euill season; the State being scarcely able, after the losse at Cannae, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that loue and care, which the priuate Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted else-where, into the relation of things whereof the truth is lesse questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke, that remember the last newes of him, and how fearefully he mistrusted his owne safetie? They finde him, and Atago, and Amilcar the sonne of Bomilcar, with an Army of threefore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably coniecture to haue stood, where Carinenna is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgi, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Illyerites their neere Neighbours, for hauing reuolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed, but most of all, for want of victualles. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Enemies Campes, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and hauing victualled the place, encourage the towne-men to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon beholde them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against three score thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, driue all the three Carthaginian Commanders, euery one out of his quarter; and tooke that day, besides prisoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Ensignes.

The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Incibili, that stood a litle Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driuen to poll the Countrey, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten in this iourney, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battel by Ibera. Howsoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them about thirteene thousand slaine, and about three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Livy gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their owne side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are ouerthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great haste ouer the Riuer. At Castrum Altum, a place in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victualles, being strong and defensible, as intending to make it his seate for a while. But the Country round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling also vpon some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in march, they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Publ. withdrawes himselfe vnto Montis vittoria: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouer-looketh the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs vnto him; and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus neere encamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himselfe to an high peece of ground; where they besiege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great city of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, ioyneth with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the Riuer Betis. Neuertheless the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to win it by famine. We may iustly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seeke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had beene so grievously beaten

the yeere before. But thither they goe: and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breaks out vpon them the next day, and in two battels kills about twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fixe and thirty Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than fuet thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that sieg is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Munda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great bataille fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, and twelue thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seauen and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auriges; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed cūen by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal: who hauing also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen ashamed, to leaue Saguntum enthrall'd vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrey once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faime (as appeares) to goe their way without it: so as they neede not to blush, for having so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrey of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (quotionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue so dishonoured them, if they had bene able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their braue exploits, wee can perceiue none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals iourney, which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporia, an Hauentowne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phoenicians, kinne to the Masilians, friends to the Romans; They haue easily wonne to their parry, lost, recovered, and lost againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other while by force, and sometimes by their owne vnstedd passions; and now finally they haue won a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those batailles lately remembered, after every one of which Asdrubal late downe before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebel, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leue and arriual of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had bene absolute Masters of the field, when they wonne Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeere following, in practising onely with the Celiberians the next adioyning people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeeres business. Of these Celiberians we heare before, That they haue yielded vpon themselves vnto the Romans for securitie of their faith, giuen Hostages to Scipio; and at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue, vnlesse perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Luise folloies, to call euery messenger, or straggler, that entered their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deale with their Countrey-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men; that all his fellows at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next haue to addeire to leade them into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability, when these mercenary Celiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipios, presuming on this access of strength, diuide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies; who be not farre off with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is neerest at hand; euen among the Celiberians, at Anisorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Atago the sonne of Gisco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is five dayes march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrey, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers, that is, two parts of the olde Roman Army, leauing the third part, and all the Celiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer iourney to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Atago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessity. They ioyne their forces together; meet with Publius Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is driuen to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches; wherein hee thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masanassa, Prince of the Massejisi, Nusidians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremisen: to whom the chiefe honor of this seruice is ascribed, for that hee becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is coming with seuen thousand and five hundred of the Susettani, to ioyne with his Enemies. Feare therefore to be streight shut vp, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leauing T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, with a full company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Nusidian horse appeare (whom he thought to haue bene ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neyther are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, vncertaine which way to turne, yet fighting and animating his men, where neede most requieth, is strucke through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Army escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty daies after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countrey. If Anisorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Buterius takes it, a Celiberian towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may iustly beleue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them; and no lesse vnable, without their helpe; either to resist the Enemy, or to ioyne with his Brother, maketh a very violent retreat; herein onely differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard vpon him: and Atago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, hauing made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is ouertaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stony ground, where growes not so much as a shrubbe, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes of easie ascent on every side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weakke defences the Carthaginians soone teare in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of them aliue, that sauing themselves, I know not how, within some woods adioyning, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could breake out, and throwd themselves within woods adioyning. I should much wonder, did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Pomilius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberia, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Romane Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choosie a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fountius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, comming vpon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men, to (fondly weeping when he led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might haue gotten, but that he wisely founds the retreat, reseruing the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his aduantage, they returne to their former security; and vterly despising him, set neither Corps du gard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neere. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with liuely words; and telsthem, That there is no aduantage more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being vnder-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of seruice. So he leads them forth by night, and scales vpon the Campe of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleep, or very drowzie, Hee enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians run head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Campe Martius hath preposessed, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and run away toward the Campe of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay six miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley betwene their two camps hee hath bestow'd a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of <sup>30</sup> Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall euery one, and are cut in peeces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficulty hee enters; and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, Hee driues head-long into flight, all that can saue themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirtie seauen thousand of the enemies perish in this nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Heereunto Valerius Antias adds, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuen thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Asdrubal, there were <sup>40</sup> slaine tenne thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Liuius therefore hath elsewhere well obserued, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilst Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Liuius reporteth as a common tale, notwithstanding thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distresse, Hee could cleerly get off from the Enemies, and giue them any parting blow, though it were farre lesse then that which is here set downe.

Of these occurrences L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good seruice, whatsoeuer it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might iudge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spain: which the better to intimate vnto them, He filed himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued with the tidings than the case required: and therefore tooke such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies leui'd to serue in that Prouince, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in vsurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to haue the souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all conuenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about sixe thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and afforded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the victories of Martius would ill haue serued, either to keepe footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Army, which was vnder Martius and Fountius; he found surer tokens of the ouerthrowes receiued, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: who how to reclaim it, would not easily be deuised. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetani, neere enough at hand, incamped in a place call'd Lapides atri, out of which there was no issue, but onely through a streight, whereon the Roman seized at his first comming. What should haue tempted any man of vnderstanding to incampe in such a place, I doe not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spain, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that hee and his Armie might be thence dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in entertaining parlee with Claudius about this businesse; That night by night he conueighed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking aduantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leauing his Campe empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spain, we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the footmen could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke mistie day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to <sup>30</sup> such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue been of farre lesse value. Howsoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recouer the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and <sup>40</sup> Publius, likely to doe good, were it reuiued in one of the same Family. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons, C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the waire into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well condition'd: especially he excelled in Temperance, Comity, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, flauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; How he is reported of him, flauouring a little too much of the great secret conference with Iupiter; vied to walke alone in the Capitol, as one that had some secret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must haue bene one of the gods; and, in likelihood Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed with his Mother, entering her Chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nought, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nought, with the rumour, by doubtfull answers, I hold them no better than fables, deuised by Historians, who thought thereby to adde vnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not onely to haue surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of vnquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Capitaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished therat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Cite stood looking one another in the face, not one of them hauing the heart, to aduenture himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twenty yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where he might be seene of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: & either very vnreaso- nable was the feare of all the Roman Captaines, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Histo- rians, I doe not willingly insilt.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spaine; and with him was ioyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foote, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrivall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with such a maiestic, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the Cen- nemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. If we must beleue this, then must we needes beleue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or as some thinke, all the next yeere) hee did no- thing; but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spani- ards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea for- ces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there to- gether with him. He assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wonne it by assault the 30 first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue been well enough defended, if some lustier men of Tarracon had not discovered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walles; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Cite of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a de- mi-land, betweene an Haven and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the wals, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fishermen of Tarracon had founded; and finding some part thereof a selfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading vp to the Nauill, Scipio thrust therinto some Com- panies of his men; who recovered the top of the walles without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. The fol- lowing suddenly vpon the backes of the Carthaginians within the Cite; easily forced a gate, and giue free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Luise himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is saine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africa and Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adioyning Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtisie; re- storing them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefite. Hereupon a Prince of the Celiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forooke the Carthaginian party, and ioyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended: for that he did not want himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vie, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuoluing from their enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being there- to compelled by iniuries of the Carthaginians, and inuited by the honourable dealing of Scipio.

Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no vntrue token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing haue beene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should haue rather craued pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howloeuver the two elder Scipio's had gotten some new places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won vnto himselfe the assured loue & assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet neuertheless they let a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, hauing stolne a Towne by surpris, was too farre transported, and ouer-ioyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne coniecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth toward Italie; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasi- on, late done before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage ouer the Lake had beene vndiscovered, and the Towne helde out some longer while. For howloeuver that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generality of the business, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingering warre of taking and retaking Towne, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprize: euen to fight in tryall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italie: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards; as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal; his Vancourers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches; and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore side; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betweene the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine, into which he descended, more vpon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, thin for that he durst aduenture his Army to the hazzard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such aduantage of place could not faue him from the Romans. They climed vp the Hill to him; they recovered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flic. Out of such a battaile, wherein hee had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyrenies, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Neuertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to haue con- sulted with him about this Warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe hee needes must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shal appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

6. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. Posthumius the Roman Generall, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedon, enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans saying with the Aetolians, make warre upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WHE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may be thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence vnto him. In former times he had found worke enough, to carry the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, then sustenance for his Army; by making him Master of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forced some walled towne, in like sort as he did Geryon, & the Castle of Canne; but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended, the hunger, that his Army must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would haue grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may haue bene the reason, why he forbore to adventure vpon Rome, after his victory at Canne. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the Citie at his first comming; want of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterprize. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, & waited perhaps the event of another battaile: if being either for want of means to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the wallles of Rome, he had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to recieue a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subiection. Thus the winter was passed: vnto the joyfull saying that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arriued no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had about thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought ouer the Alpes, had bene lost in his iourney through the Marishes of Heurria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought th' Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwile, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a later, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselfe had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the iourney; than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to recieue the Fleete that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere serued, He tooke the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Cassilunum, fought to make himselfe Master of some good Haueu-towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To this same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilco vnto the Lucians, and Hanno to the Lucians: not forgetting at once to asslay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicily and Sardinia; since the siege of Rome, must needs be deferred vnto another yeere. Hanno made an ill iourney off, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue about two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petellia or Petilia by force, after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Coniuntia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Laetri was was of great importance, yeeled vnto him: as did all other places thereabout; except onely the Towne of Rhegium, over against Sicily.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good gouernment, vnder which the Roman subiects liued. As for the Samnites, Campanians, and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers receiued answer from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left meanies, to relieue their Associates that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a priuate iurisdiction within themselves) fell downe to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any relief. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to retorne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne safety, as hauing already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and hauing striuen in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility, came to the Carthaginians a bloudie victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their losse at Canne, they had shewed their high minds, by enterprising the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better then at home. L. Posthumius Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Armie of five and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Pinens they had sent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if hee desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that hee should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Phariis, their Subiect and Rebell, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little surable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Armie was cut in peeces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his comming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees so far, that a little force would serue to cast them downe: When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gauls, that lay about the Wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouerwhelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of sawing for many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuice was subiect; I do not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue bene done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the sauage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countie now so ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleauesed, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessel, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amaze ment was no lesse then the calamitie. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted force to rebuys. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdileus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few yeeres following, the Romans dealt vpon euen termes, entreating their assistance against Philip and Persens; not commanding their dutie, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For lousie of Philips greatnes: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity, of being chosen by the Atolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being ioyned with the maine power of Atolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his trouble some neighbours desired peace of him, and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadors, in stead of making submission, propoised vnto him such intolerable conditions, as ill becomed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being besieged in their owne Townes, that had made to them desirous of composition. This leare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as cuer: and thrust a garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatened Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupactus, wasted the Countrey in a terrible beauerie: wherein Philip requited them, coming vpon them in great haste from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing sicker, than they came.

In the heare of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip; sent a Naue into Greece, to assist the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reason; as being more interested in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships; yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueres. Whertore it behoued him, to vse the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastning vpon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrey. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that hee should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Towne, He was encountred by the Atolian and Roman garrison, which draue him backe with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intended a great conuerſion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detriment, in his retreat from Elis: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentie thousand head of Cattle, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Countrey was inuaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a lowe tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was garked vpon by an Atolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well knowne, and the tale beleued. All Macedon therefore was in an vpror: and not onely the Borders, ready to fall vpon the Countrey, but some Captaines of Philip, easily corrupted, who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaians. He also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom he meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-faouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubaea, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arriue to help; where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue bene lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer against Eubaea, Attalus had worne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed. Now because the Roman souldiers had defrauded him in the sacke of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilest he was busie, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philips arriuall, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships; finding the Romans gone gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignity of this misadventure; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his inuasion vpon the kingdome of Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends. So Philip re- covered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonis, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Atolians. In the same season, Machanidas, the tyrant of Lacedemon; had bene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arriuall, was returned home.

The Lacedemonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Aegypt, went about to chooſe two new Kings, and to conforme themselves to their old manner of gouernement. But their Estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proved no lesse vnfortunate, than had bene their attempts of recouering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant rose vp among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas, & shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Atolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achaians, that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and Lacedemonian. But of these we shall speake more hereafter.

Philip entering into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrey; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, such haste they made, for feare of being overtaken. But flight, hee said, was not alwayes preseruous: hee should one day light vpon them; as ere this hee had times had done, and still to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words: and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation some Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, hee rendered Alphiera. The Dymeans, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, hee bought out, ranfomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, hee fell vpon the Atolians: whom hee drave into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds, and wasted their Countrey. This done, hee tooke leaue of the Achaians: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subiects, or dependents: and animated them so well, that they feared fearelesse of any threatening danger. Then had hee leisure to make warre vpon the Dardaniens, all neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuertheless he was not so far occupied, but that hee could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred galleies, wherby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when hee lately ranne along the coast of Greece, full by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldned him to make strong warre vpon the Atolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates, or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italy; caused them to giue out the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Atolians therefore, being driuen to great extremities, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie five galleies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Atolia, hee turned aside to Dyrrachium & Apollonia, making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell, but hee refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Countrey round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close within the walls of Apollonia, making some Outrages of peace: which caused Philip returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Atolians, as had Philip, to take in cuil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desert, before hee would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Asolian Pyracies. Onely once they came to his help, which was, at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arrival: having done nothing, and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, euen at such time as Philip, with his owne Naue, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This retchlesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to haue bene one of Hanno his trickes, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to heare that so great a King made offer to serue in person vnder Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Enuie could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thrifitie course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian waies so mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire, or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges: and feede the Macedonian with hopes, by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing; yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once hee was engaged in the warre, be vrged vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges, yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thanks. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal euerie day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should be free, so as the trouble some Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betweene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Affricke, should wait vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such iniuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good; but rather dodged with him; euen in their little courtlesse which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he beganne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had hee not vainly giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Asolians had submitted themselues already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, hee might giue ouer the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselues. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their fakes; but they despised him, as if the quarrell were merely his owne, and he vnable to manage it.

The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the counsaits, that somewhat might seeme to haue bene gotten. On the other side, the Attinians were appointed to retaine vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably coniectures) the people of the Country about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prousias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Bootians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Illyria, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedaemon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Asolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Asolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much vpon their old honour, and loyed to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the setting downe of their names in this Treatie, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a buisie people, and mislaid occasion to renew the warre, when means did better serue to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publike necessities of their Common-wealth.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had bene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the lesse harmful, if their care of Italy had bene such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeere to yeere, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could haue desired. The death of Publius, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaul; the beginning rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their preiudice, in the whole Ile of Sicily; as also that warre, of which we last spake, threatened from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so neerely after their terrible overthrow at Cannae, among so many renolds of their Italian Confederates; would vterly haue sunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeere, yet at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuersitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administered in reuerence vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their severall Armies. This had not bene a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had bene thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hope and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue bene strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spain; the lingring aide which they sent, to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-neere beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastie catching at Sicily: little deferred to bee thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather euerie one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no other wise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal, then must hee patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were enuieous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessities; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumae, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be reserved for a worke of more importance. Many offers he made vpon Nola, but alwayes with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne, hauing the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great menaile; his forces being then diuided, and employed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was, euen in those dayes, a strong Citie; and required a yeeres worke to haue taken it by force.

C c c c c

Wherefore

Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the towne of Cuma they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campanians) to be present at a solemne sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to enertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being iudged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they faigned so to haue done, because this was the first time, that euer two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of Religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campanians: not able to meet the Enemy in field; yet intentive to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had bene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, He continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skillfull in the exercises of warre, than to keepe him from quarrels, that might arise by vbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilst the Consul was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cuma sent him word of all that had passed betwene them and the Campanians. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had had experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cuma: whence hee issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campanians. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama, three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Atilius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with foureteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather desirous how to surpriue others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meate and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights seruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; looting not aboue an hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tarried not long to rife it, for feare of Hannibal, who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, he escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hama, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to find those young soldiers, and slaues, busied in making spoile; and loosing themselves with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellows spent, about this towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it; which they brought close vnto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an high Tower: whence they made resistance; and found means at length, to consume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busied in quenching the fires; the Romans, gillyng out of the towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drave them to their trenches, with the slaughter of about foureteene hundred. The Consul wisely founded the Retreat: ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to require their seruice. Neither would he, in the pride of this good successe, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battell the day following, nere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old campe at Tifata. About the times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small townes were recovered by the Romans; & the people secretly punished for their revolt.

The

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it selfe, was driuen in the meane time to alter his course of warre: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a generall inuasion vpon the whole Country; to passe from place to place, and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samniters was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe; to get the Soueraintie. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they ouer-burdened their new Lords, and gaue vnto their old, the more easie means, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentiue, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formality, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus, knowing in what neede the Citie stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, serued to put the Campanians in feare, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest enuocation came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The garrison in Puteoli was fixe thousand strong: and did their due so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could only shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assayed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein hee had very great intelligence. Whilst hee was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a iourney against Beneuentum: and T. Gracchus the last yeeres Consul, halting from Nucerina, met him there; and fought with him a battell, Hanno had with him about seuenne thousand foot, Brutians and Lucians for the most part; besides twelue hundred horse; very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moors. Hee held the Roman worke foure houres, ere it could be perceiued, to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his soldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late armed slaues, had received from their Generall a peremptory detunction; That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their liberty, bringing euery man, for price thereof an Enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in easily shewing their vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, by cutting off the slaine enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the seruice, by employment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victory. Gracchus therefore finding his owne contriue, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads; and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should haue libertie immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them runne headlong vpon the Enemy; whom their desperate furie had souke ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horse could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard vpon the Romans battell; that foure thousand of the slaues, (for seruice either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the battell, vnto those that should not valiantly bechuse the slaues) retired vnto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to save himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Army was broken; being viable to remedy the losse. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were Horse; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his soldiers that reward of libertie which he had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had received

unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they served in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, vnlesse sicknesse forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publique by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaves manumitted) with Caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy remembrance) was after ward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie, which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hania, being things of so small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasure was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to help it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worke doe than before; as lining vpon the same trade, and subiect to the same inconvenience, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to holde so them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffred his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the popl, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italie, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturalls declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipios in Spain; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the letters of the two Scipios from Spain; they resolved vpon the onely course, without the which the Citie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to Assembly: wherein Quintus Fulnius the Pretor bidde open the publike waues; and plainly sayd, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needfull to the Soule; but as for such as had stiffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loans of their commodities, and labours, until the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, (especially the Publicans or Customers), and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuenues, that the charge was vnder-taken by private men, and the Armie in Spain as well supplied, as if the Treasury had bene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intente, to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselves in this present warre. They beganne with L. Caelius Metellus: who, after the battell at Canna, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had bene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his Campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; euen who before had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed. Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as other wise it had yfed to be) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serue until the end of the warre, vnder the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canna. The Office of the Censors was; to take the List and account of the Citizens, to choise or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose dishonest or vnclimely behaviour fell not within the compasse of the Law. They tooke also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publike Horles of seruice, vnto such as they thought meete; or tooke them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens liues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rancke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Dieties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moraltie, they had the charge of all publike Workes; as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man encreached vpon the freetes, High-ways, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customs, and other publike Reuenues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office, as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conferre the dignitie of the Senate: the commonaltie being obnoxious vnto the Censors, which were alwayes of that Order, and careful to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impouerished by warre, and hauing small store of lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had bene accustomed, in more happy times; to vnder-take such peeces of worke, offered now themselves willingly to the Censors, as if there had bene no such want: promising liberally high cost and trauell, with the expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had bene enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forebare the price of them, until the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euer one was able, the common necessitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treasury, and thence the Questors kept a Booke of all that was layed out for the sustentance of these Widowes and Orphans: whilst the whole stocke was vsed by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Squidiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Athenians, that did accept it, when their Countrey was in so great want.

These welch hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride, yielded halfe so much commoditie; as might be layed in ballance against these miseries, wherein their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless, if we consider things aright, the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Ligencies, whom shee forthwith vnder-tooke, than in abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto shee attained; seeing the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we haue already mentioned: For by this hammering, the Roman metall grew more hard and solid: and by pruning the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens, when Xerxes had bittern the Towne to ashes, and taken from euerie particular Citizen, all hopes of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happiness of the vniuersall state. Certayne it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciously obserued) That a State, whose dimensions or frame is finally may apply serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie; which this ill comes to passe, where all regard of domesticall prosperitie is laid aside; and euerie mans care addressed on the benefit of his Countrey. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath scene a great example, in the vniuersal Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, or almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alua; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme indurie, and straining themselves to fill their publique Treasure, they are all growne wealthy, (strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their seruices by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and about all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: wee may truly say, That the Citie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all reason haue bene more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleued their own interest to be as great, in those warres which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not haue bene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath given vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subiect vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their times appointed.

S. XIII.

The Romans winne some Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the warre: so their Generalls abroad omitted no part of industrie, in seeking to recover what had bene lost. The towne of Castine Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garrison; and likely to haue bene relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Neuertheless the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. Hee said, That many such things, as were not at first to haue bene vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted vnto the best effect: So the siege held on; and the towne was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearful; and craved parlee, offering to give it vp, so as all might haue leaue to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diuersly reported) Marcellus seizing vpon a Gate; entered with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul: who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made prisoners. If Fabius deferred commendations; by holding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as escaped the heere of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some equiuocation; but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mommi Marfian in Gallaigne taken by the Marshall Antioch, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their fetherall guards, vpon hastie desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed: The Marshall therefore discouering a part of the walls vnguarded, entered by Scalado, and put all saue the Governour into the sword. Herein that Governour of Mommi Marfian committed two grosse errors; the one; in that hee gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for alliance giuen and receiued. Some such ouer-sight, the Governour of Castine seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, nor by Antioch, was very honorable.

table. When this Worke was ended, many small townes of the Sammites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or slaine, about siue and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrey grieuouly wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sicke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promised to giue vp the towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thrust so many men into it, that the traitours durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart, hauing wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrey, but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So hee departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and beganne to victual it, when Summer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne, in which regard if he beganne his winter more timely, than otherwise he required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessity enforced, to make their Summer last as long, as they were able to trauell vp and downe the Countrey.

About this time beganne great troubles in Seil, whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Prouince, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique seruice, to imploy often-times their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meete him: cleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse-backe, which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The father cheerefully did so, saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest vnderstand thy selfe to be Consul. Cassius Alinius a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Cannae, had holpen the Carthaginian into that towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it backe vnto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Alinius a pattern to all traitors; vsing him, as Camillus and Fabritius had done those, that offered their vnfaithfull seruice against the Falisci, and King Pyrrius. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and sayd, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Alinius was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather seuer, than couetous, he sent for the wife and children of Alinius into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which hee wonne by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Fieue thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the towne, and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust forthmost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the towne-men suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdome, to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protesting, that they had bene betrayed by their Princes; and were become subiect to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In proceesse of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Consul: and receiuing his faith for security of the Towne, presently presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding like it is, that Hannibal men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and serve on the Roman side, it was yet covenanted, that the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman againe, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Indianus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cnens Fulvius, another of the Pretors, an hundred & twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their seruice, vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods restored vnto them, when their citie should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campanians toward Rome, it serued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had beene promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurmes, people of the Brutians, which had yielded themselves to Hannibal, returned againe to their olde allegiance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himselfe a Capitaine, and; often reputation by some petty exploits in foraging the Countrey, was slaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians lacked to send. Long he waited, ere hee could bring his desire to pass: and being both to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligences, He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassadour, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his company were the next day so cloely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, where they suffered death as traitors. By reason of this crueltie, or iusticie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they went againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vied much to goe forth of the town: on hunting by night, as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seeme to haue beene abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes iourney to Tarentum, if he should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place to the lesse to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure, Hee caused it to be begun out, that he was sicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne careless of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their businesse in order, He took with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before breake of day, made all speed thitherward. Foure score light horse of the Numidians ranne a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discouered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, took it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet disclosed; and gave so order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them off their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night, Hannibal guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arrival, Nico, that was within the towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was ready. Presently Nico beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called vpon the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a great Boe, so heauy, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket and forthwith forthwith entered two young men, laden with the Boare; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largenesse of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Boare-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when hee had slaine, he entered the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entering Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the city, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in sight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the towne was in an uproare: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpeter was vnskillfully sounded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoyle the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boare, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might easily perceiue the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vnderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inueighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else hee thought fit for the present. This done: and having gotten such spoile as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Town; hee addressed himselfe against the Citadell, hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, hee might giue them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Pecee. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when hee beganne to make his approaches, the Romans in a brauerie falling forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell backe of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and silently setting vpon the Enemy, draue him backe with great slaughter, as fast as hee could runne; so that afterwards hee durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood vpon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified onely with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was ioyned by a cawley. This cawley Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that hee conceiued hope of winning the Pecee it selfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilst he was busied in his workes, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of preuailling, & made him returne to his former counsaile. Now so farre as the Tarentine fleet lay within the hauens, and could not passe forth, whilst the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea: whilst the Roman garrison, by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconuenience, it was rather willed by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the hauens, to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their frontes being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer Land, and launch them into the Sea without. This he vnderooke, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required.

Thus with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twentie Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastic growth from that want of men, and of all necessities, whereinto the losse at Canna had reduced them. But to fill vp these Legions, they were faine to take vp young Boyes, that were vnder seuenne yeeres of age: and to send Commissioners about fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare seruiceable, and pressing them to the wars, making yet a Law, That their yeeres of seruice, whereinto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had beene of lawfull age.

Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campans felt great want of victuall, as if they had already beene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going yeres made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to be shordy. Hee gaue them comfortable words: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victualls, that hee would prouide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantitie of graine, that had beene layd vp in Cities round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time too appoynted came no more than fortie Cartes or Wagons, with a few packe-horses; as if this had bene enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceding angry herat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not reach them to haue greater care. Wherefore he gaue them a longer day; against which he made prouision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum by night; where with diligence hee made inquite into the behaviour of the Enemy. Hee learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great haruelt. Hereupon the Consul bad his men prepare themselves to assault the Enemies campe: and leaving all his impediments within Beneuentum, hee marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, hee had wel-nere forced the Campe on the sudden. But it was very strong and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Fulvius to lose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore hee layd, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of his Armie, and to lie betwene Hanno and home; that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieue them. Being thus discouraging, and about to found thereat; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart. There was great boote, or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominy, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers aduerture so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had already gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the Campe was wonne: in which were slaine aboue fixe thousand; and taken, abouteuen thousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misaduenture, and the neerer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that hee was wont to protest vnto their Cittie; and how hee had made shew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if hee gaue not strong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoile, vnlesse he himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which hee saw in so many townes adioyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Græcia. These people took to hart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soone as the Roman garrison was taken from them, to defend the Citadell of Tarentum, made no more ado; but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurins would haue done the like, vpon the like reason, had not some companies launce in their Townes;

Towne; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Neuerthelesse, they helped themselves by cunning: inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neare at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their seruice to Atinius, the Roman Capitaine, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A little formality they vsed in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans, in sauing Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; & also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practise) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this dispute lasted not long: for they that had remoued the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and deliuered vp the towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilst the Consuls fortifying Beneuentum to secure their backs, addressed themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprize. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late been twice Consul, was slaine, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian traitors, among whom he fell vnawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans, to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneuentum, there to secure the backe of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hindrance of that busines. The Volones or Slaves lately manifested, to looke their Ensignes, and went euery one whither he thought good, as if they had bene discharged by the deesse of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them backe into their camp. Neuerthelesse, the Consuls went forward with their work: and drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hostility which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome, wherein aboue fiftene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; insomuch that hee caused them to dislodge. They remoued by night, and went severall wayes: Fulvius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who hauing led him a great walke, fetched a compasse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centurius a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not farr from thence, where Hannibal rested, when hee was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Pennib had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reiect the vertue of any good Souldier, how meane soeuer his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand: and hee himselfe being a proper man, and talking brauely gathered vnto many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, hee gaue proofe of the difference, betwene a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) slaine, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius, a Roman Pretor with eightene thousand men, was in Apulia, very earlesse, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore hee hasted, to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when hee should haue cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces about, vnder men of small ability. Coming vpon Fulvius, he found him and his men so iolly, that needes they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battell to Fulvius, hee soone had him in so the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aliue, leauing all, but two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, receiued the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuerthelesse, all care was taken, to gather vp the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sate downe before the towne and C. Claudius Nere, one of the Pretors, came with his Army from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would issue out of Capua before a certaine day prefixed, should haue his pardon, and be suffered to enioy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously reiected, the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long iourney, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he returned to Brundisium, vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as brauely re-comforted. Hee bade them consider, how a few dayes since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither againe, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get backe into the City; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, hee was of opinion, that Capua, being very wel manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time; and therby by giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered, and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie the selfes at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilst he himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The townes-men often sallied out; rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foote was easily beate) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirnish. In these exercises the Campan vsually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy, who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore desired, that some active and courageous young men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes, leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thicke vpon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their Campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whol power, in as terrible maner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of vserviceable people on the walls, which with a loud noyse of Pans and Balons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campan, easily defended his Trenches against them, and so well pressed them, that he draue them at length backe into their City. Neuertheless, in pursuing them to their gates. He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fulvius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian army. The Roman camp was euen at poynt to haue bin lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch and filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assailants. It is sayd, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine well, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That euerie one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next hills, forasmuch as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Army, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly entrenched it selfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine citadell, had well-neere lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum, were to haue been much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, to set vpon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of waite that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one

one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the Campan, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His onely feare was, lest the Campan, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeild themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtle Nimidian: who running as a fugitive into the Roman Campe, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The journey to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe, telling in the suddenesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readie ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Army ouer the Riuer of Fulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate which was therewith affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsell to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather than to put the towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly sayd, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serue the turne well enough, to keep him out, and send him thence, if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew full, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behouefull: & if it might conveniently be, whether to raise their siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much aduantage. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fiftene thousand foot; and Claudius the chiefe of his whole Army: with which he halst toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not trauell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Fulturnus, burnt vp all his boates; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or assault him. Then halst he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than hee needed must. Yet found he the Bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregelle: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grievously to spoyle their lands, whilst the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that hee drew to Rome, the greater waste hee made: his Nimidians running before him; drining the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were filled with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great market, or place of Assembly; ready to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take direction: given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was halting to the defence of the city. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the City in time of such need, an Aete was passed, That hee should haue equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soone after another: Fulvius hauing bene long held occupied in passing ouer Fulturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Country was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater, so tooke they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio or Anten, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way vnder the walls, viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driuen away, without doing, or receiuing any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. About the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (vpon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans; there were some twelue hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, whereto it was thought that their seruice might be vsfull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherewith they differed to nor from the followers of Hannibal; bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproare, among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the walls. The noyse was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cattails, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the passage was stoppt vp: and the poore Numidians pitifully beaten from the house toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not bene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedy the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authoritie as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented before the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertooke it. It is sayd, that a terrible shewre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their feuerall Campes: and that this hapned two dayes together, the weather breaking vp and clearing as soone as they were departed asunder: certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not endure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well aduised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parced (as is sayd) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be giuen to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great soeuer it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared little than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Henceunto it helped wel, that at the same time, the supply appointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipios, was sent out of the towne, & went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panick terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause knowne, or no cause answerable to the greatnes of the sudden consternation, it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men haue fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause hisouldiers to disarm themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of their wift not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproare in his army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had sent the Ass into the campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, & augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to haue bene diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that tear, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very peece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bene in time of peace. This indignity coming to his eare, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made sport-sale of the Siluer-smiths shoppes, which were neere about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne, were no whit worse, than any Roman Citizens could be vnto that peece of ground, whercon he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing worth. The Romans did seeke to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceiued, Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed vnto himselfe, this iourney had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake vp his Campe: and doing what

spoile he could in the Roman Territories, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest ouer the Countrey, and ranne toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arriuall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gaue it lost: and is likely to haue cursed the whole faction of Hanno; which thus disabled him to relieue that faire Citie, since hee had no other way to vent his griefe.

Ennius returning backe to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who so would yeeld, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Ennius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, euerymans conscience of his owne euill defaults, told him, that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Boissar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to conuey such Letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was vndertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues out of the Towne, into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned ere they could conueigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Towne; and the Letters of Boissar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that hee would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (sayd they) wee came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions where soeuer they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue wee gotten those victories at Tribia, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine, they besought him, that hee would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate fallie, if he would once more aduenture to set vpon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Boissar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now beganne to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) hee was vanquished by Hannibal. Lu. lib. 30. and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had bene sent out by the Harmonians, to obstrue the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were so, iustly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessitie. How soeuer it were, the Letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfaint fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them backe into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans; so that the multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeeres since had bene most forward in ioyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies sought vpon their bodies. About euen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poison. All the rest hoping for more mercie than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Towne-gates was set open; whereto a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe: at their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons vpon them all, and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe custodie; some to Cales; others to Theruntum. Touching the generall multitude, they were referred vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vied by Ennius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduersity. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately receiued: yet was he not inexorable to the Capuans; as hauing loved them wel in former times, and hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Pachnum, of whom we spake before. But this facility his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance: for feare, left upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behoufull to the common safetie, and honour of their State. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theannum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he strucke off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all townes of Italy the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campan: and bred a generall inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines, & Sabatines, people of the Campan, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare, & want of ability to resist. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young Gentlemen, burning with fire of Reuenge, got into Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the city was like to haue bin consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no casualtie. Wherefore liberitie was proclaimed vnto any slave, and other sufficient reward to any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out, and the Campan being detected by a slave of their owne (to whom about his liberty promised, was given about the summe of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to 30 their delicts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had bene an harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wiues and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referred to further deliberation: but the generallitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certayne day, and confined vnto severall places as best liked the angry victors. As for the towne of Capua, it was suffered to 30 stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious site: but no corporation or forme of politie, was allowed to be therein onely a Roman Prouost was every yeere sent to gouerne ouer those that should inhabit it, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being spent; and that which should haue reuiued his flame, being unfortunately shed, as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicily, held warre against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

W Hilest things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicily by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end, by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: about thirty thousand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Hariscoras with his sonne Hyoilus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his Countrey. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprife so carelesse, as in the rest of their maine undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had bene better, if 50 their care had bin directed vnto the prosecution of that maine businesse in Italy, whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would haue sufficed, if they could haue hindered the Romans from sending an Armie into Sardinia. Hariscoras with his followers might well enough haue serued to drue out Quintus Mutius the Prætor, who lay sicke in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne body, than in his traine. But whilest they sought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sence was most grievous; they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprife enterprife was such; as may seeme to haue encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent ouer Asdrubal, surnamed, the Bold, with a competent fleet and armie; assisted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion; and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barbantine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremity of foule weather, was cast vpon the Baleares: so beaten and in such euill plight, that the Sardinians had euen spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelue 10 hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preferue and vp-hold in their severall Prouinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had bene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincials; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most readie and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people (subdued). Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwayes in readinesse fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius, retayned in obedience 10 all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Hariscoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we haue spoken before: hee landed at Calariis or Carallius, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrey, and fought out the Enemy. Hyoilus, the sonne of Hariscoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Armie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This young Gentleman would needes adventure to get honour, by giuing battell to the Romans at his owne discretion. So hee rashly ad- ventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee receiued a terrible ouerthrow; 30 and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyoilus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Iland: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeature came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as hee might haue done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to sue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himselfe backe to Calariis: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance; their Countrey being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calariis: where if hee had stayed a little longer, Asdrubal would 40 haue sought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appeares to haue bin greater than was their strength. For after some small made of them in a few skirmishes, Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile; wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians, three thousand. Four hundred the battell lasted, and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had bene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of yong Hyoilus, and of his father Hariscoras, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuitie of Asdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in short 50 space wonne the Towne. All other Cities of the Ise that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yielded vnto the Roman; who imposing vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best sorted with the nature of their severall offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calariis with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome, leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicily was of greater length, and euery way more burdesome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not onely sauers of their owne, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the citie and dominion of Syracuse, so that which they enjoyed before. Soone after

after the battell of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a steadfast friend vnto the Romans, and greatly releued them in this present warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeares of age, Gelo his sonne, that should haue bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his successor, Hiero appointed fifteene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius, who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he iudged most likely to preserue the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing weary of so many coadiutors, beganne to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeares; and sayd, that he was able to rule the kingdome without help of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to passe, in a sort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby hee offended the eyes of his people, that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behauiour, suitable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that in course of life, he would reniue the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he tooke the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to liue in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoide the danger of his displeasure; that seemed worse than death it selfe. Onely Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraseo continued in grace with him, and were his Counsaillers, but not of his Cabiners. These, howeuer they agreed in other points, were at some dissention about that maine point of aduicing, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thraseo, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilst as yet it remained somewhat doubtful, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his person, was detected by a groom of his, to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, vnto the extremitie of the torture, he confessed, that he had bene set on by Thraseo; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were near in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and neuer shrinkt for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraseo was taken out of the way, quickly resolved vpon siding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neede, had of late bene such, as might haue bene termed excessive, were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein he tooke order for his owne Estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the young Prince, taking little heede of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things present, the weakenesse of Rome; the preuaient fortunes of Carthage; and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entered into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusian. These grew into such fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betwene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoff. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe, saying, That he could hardly beleue the Carthaginians 10

so wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he should reigne ouer all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italy. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, than were enforced vpon them by necessity; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had receiued such blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his iourney, as much discontented him when hee came into Sicily, and forbade him to looke bigger. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carry backe vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But in stead of returning the money with thanks, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noised abroad that he should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (wherof we haue spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine-glorie, and send word after him, that he should consign that money ouer to Marcus Valerius, of whose voyage into Greece, the Citie had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxt with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimitie, into such a pittifull tune of thanksgiving, as must needs haue bred sorrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of pastime & scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilst Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resolved how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great inuouation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer, had it bene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom wee spake before, were sent about the Country with two thousand men, to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a city of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators took him on the sudden: as he was passing through a narrow street: and rushing betwene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the found of that word so ioyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Army, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcase to lie vnburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away; to signifye all that had passed, to stirre vp the people to libertie, and to preuent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowes would make offer to usurpe a Tyranny. The Syracusians hereupon presently tooke Armes, and made themselves masters of their owne City. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island: being yet vncertaine what to doe; betwene desire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprize mis-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Proverbe, which Dionysius had vied, That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haied out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horse backe. But feare, and better counsaile prevailed to erre, that Andronodorus, hauing slept vpon the matter, dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope vnto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the people: telling them, that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselves in so great a change; that hee had stood in feare, lest they would not haue containeyd themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather haue sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to raiuish their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer, he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendred vp the charge committed vnto him, by one that had been an euill cuill master both to him and them. Hercupon great ioy was made, and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignty, and so vehement were the insigulations of his wife, that shortly hee beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicles, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himselfe strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicles had bene with the Syracusian Pretors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to instructions of their Capaine, had done him, whilst he liued, what seruice they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed; and with a conuoy, that might keepe them from falling to into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hostile as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and that they had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Andronodorus were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had found great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Hieronymia the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hercupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entring into the Senate, were shyned out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilst Hieronymus liued, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to usurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessory to this dangerous treason: and that the vniuersal spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recovered those royall ornaments and Soueraigne power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero & Gelo were also condemned to die; and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their lues. Demarata, and Harmonia had perhaps deserved this heavy sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered together with her two young daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash iudgement. Her husband Sosippus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect loathed by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to king Ptolomie &c. he durst not returne home, but stayed in Aegypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardoning them all lues) all cried out vpon the authors of so foule a butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to Latish their anger, they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowe, not onely of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicles Pretor, another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the olde Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generally cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betwene the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in teare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicily, they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garrison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended by such fugitives, and mercenary souldiers, as were most burdnesome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the

the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicles fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their Streets the Tyrant was slayne, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enioy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion ouer those that had broken the Chaine, and wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his aduice was, that such their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hercunto occasion was giuen by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans & Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had bene subiect to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vassals vnto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due, Epicles told them, that in this nouelle of change, they had fit opportunity to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had bene subdued by the same hand, which tooke liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded vnto Syracuse, and bene subiect vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable, than iust. Neuertheless, the motion of Epicles was highly approved: in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicles, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to obserue the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in oneday. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, whereto Hippocrates and Epicles fled; and stealing thence away by night, conueyed themselves into the towne of Herbesu. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains vsed after victory, to seeke out the fugitiue Roman slaues and renegados, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Towne-men and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy; forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary sort. It was sayd, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Childe, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusian Army vpon the way, as it was going to ioyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had bene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Sosis and Dinomenes, two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Country: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had bene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vniuersal thoughts another way, and set them a worke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their seruice. So towards Herbesu they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicles, the architects of all this mischief, deuising what further harmes they might doe; but now so weakly accompanied, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hercof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore aduented vpon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesu unarmed; with Oliue branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Cree were in the vanguard, that that had bene well vsed by Hieronymus, and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and lovingly dismissed them. These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheere, saying, That no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vse their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by severity, which would not serue. For when they commanded these two traitors to be layd in yrons; the exclamation was so violent against them, that faime they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara, wher they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a trick, whereby to help himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused Letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trusty Cretians, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines; but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in generall, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeited Epistle was openly rehearsed, the vproare was such, that Sisus and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the Campe, and flic for their liues. All the Syracusians remayning behinde, had bene cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued amongst the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnes. This incensed not onely the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (sayd some) was the auarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort got into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might haue bene tempted with a farre greater booty. Whilst they were thus discouraging, and deniuing how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vntill for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the towne, that laboured to breake it open. So he entered and immediately fell vpon the Pretors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day hee went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty vnto all slaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the world and basest sort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Tiele, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Hauens, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he neare with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to doe hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants, and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enioy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicles briefly answered, That if their errand had bene to him, he could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernement in their hands. As for the warre which they threatened; he told them, they should finde by experience, That to besiege Syracuse, was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them gone; and returned backe into the City. Immediately beganne the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of wals as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neuertheless all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailling by open force, taken from him by the successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the City, that bred such despaire of halstie victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of Warre, as being in this extremitie put in vs, did more mischief to the Romans than could haue bene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age bene knowne. This Archimedes discouraging once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remooue the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For prooofe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preferre the City from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done vnto the liberal sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workmanship, and gaine, of base handi-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed vnto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man to wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath bene the vnhappy fate of great inuencions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as falling within compass of the meanest wit; & things, that euery one could well haue performed. Hercof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he vnderwent before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent prooofe. He that looks vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuentors any whit the lesse, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handi-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes, which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wifemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankinde; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is kinde of iniustice, that the long trauels of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; yeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serueth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath dected to indue them. Neuertheless, if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine vpon the iust, and vniust: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may be peruerred by euill men to a mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecourable poyson: much better it were, that such a iewel remaine close in the hands of a wise and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischief. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended vnto very commendable ends. They were Engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse, not fit for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vse them, but referred so much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approoued vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit to his Country. For to enricht a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caſtled certaine of his Quinquere Gallies to be faſtned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had sundrie devices, of which any one fort might haue repelled the assaillants: out of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heavy stones & long pieces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships, which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay fare off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall volley of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoisted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten that they durst neuer come to any second assaill. In the like sort was the Land-armie handled. Stones & timber, falling vpon it like hail; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assaill. For remedie hereof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could early before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blanche, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woond vp hard to shoot a great compass. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaillants liues. For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to tarry by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare, against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without, hee might haue holpen by some device, to makethem vnſcruiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vſe them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouiſion of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very deperate peece of worke. For the enemies hauing ſo goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to ſupply them: were not likeliſo ſoone to bee conſumed with famine, as the beſiegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before ſo ſtrong a City, hauing no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counſell to follow, this was thought the beſt, and moſt honourable courſe.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates aduerted of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there ſo dealt with the Senate, that ſiue and twentie thouſand Foote, three thouſand Horſe, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicily by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeld vnto him. To remedie this miſchiefe, and to ſtay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, roſe from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Iſland. He tooke Pelorus and Herbafus, which yielded vnto him. He tooke alſo Megara by force and ſackit: either to terrifie others that were obſtinate, eſpecially the Syracuſians, or elſe becauſe Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie muſt haue ſomewhat to keepe it in heart. His eſpeciall deſire was to haue ſaued Agrirentum: whether he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned backe toward Syracuse; carefully, and in ſo good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too ſtrong for him. The circumſpection that he vſed, in regard of Himilco, ſtood him in good ſtead, againſt a danger that he had not miſtruſted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately iſſued out of the Citie, with ten thouſand foote, and ſiue hundred horſe, horſe; intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus ſet vpon him; ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an eaſie victorie, againſt the diſperſed and halfe vnarmed Syracuſians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keepe the Scillians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Iſland at his pleaſure, and preſented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wiſely reſuſed it. Bomilcar alſo a Carthaginian, entred with a great ſtee into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the diſpoſition of the Iſlanders changed ſo againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which eſcaped from Himilco, and ſafely arrived at Marcellus his Campe: yet many places reſolued vnto the Carthaginians, and ſlew or betrayed the Roman Garrifons.

In the midſt of theſe troubles, Winter enforced both parties to take breath a while: and Marcellus leauing ſome of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not ſeeme to haue giuen ouer the ſiege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intentione to all occaſions. In the beginning of the Spring he ſtood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious worke of beſieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrirentum, againſt Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnble to preuaile: & he himſelf was of an eager diſpoſition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not ſaſſible, an enterpriſe that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth ſomewhat, which might fulfill his deſire. Eſpecially he aſſaied to preuaile by treaſon againſt which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracuſian Gentlemen that were in his Campe; exhorting them to praſtiſe with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not eaſie for them to doe, becauſe the Towne would haiken to no parole. At length a ſlaue vnto one of theſe baniſhed men, making ſhew to runne away from his Maſter, got into Syracuse, where hee talked in priuate with ſome few, as hee had bene intruſted. Thus began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conſpirators vſed to ſend him aduertement of their proceedings, by a ſilber-boate that paſſed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of foureſcore, and thought themſelves able to effect ſomewhat of importance, all was diſcoouered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damaspippus a Lacedemonian, that had bene ſent out of the Towne as an Embaſſador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very deſirous to ranſome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpoſe, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Arte of Geometrie, ſet to numbing the ſtones: and, making an eſtimate of the height, iudged it leſſe than it had bene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who cauſing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakeſt part of the Towne, and therefore the moſt ſtrongly garded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force againſt Archimedes, if they failed to take it by ſurpriſe. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great ſeaft was to be held vnto Diana, which was to laſt three daies: and that, becauſe other good cheare was not ſo plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large diſtribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not bee wiſhed. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Feſtiuall night, came vnto the walls, which he took by Scala. Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or ſiue, if Epipela were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as diſtinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten ſome peeces, he hid the commoditie of a better and ſafe lodging, with good ſtore of bootie; and better opportunitie then before, to deale with the reſt. For there were now a great many, as well of thoſe in Acradina & the Iſland, inner parts of the Towne, as of thoſe that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to haiken vnto compoſition, as being much terrified by the loſſe of thoſe parts, which the Romans had taken and ſackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto thoſe that were ſheltered vnder ſtrong houſes: although it may ſeeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnſuſtained of his helpe; ſince they held out a good while and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegados, were more carefull than euer to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the olde Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicides sallied out of Areadima vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assailants were repelled. Neuerthelesse, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as streightly besieged, as hee himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Capitaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat loole) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to doe his Countreie seruice: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. Hee arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid; being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serue the enimie than him. Thither sailed Epicides out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was ready for him, hee stood off into the deepe; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durst not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agigentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as neere as they could safely, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicil was giuen as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gaue care: for hee had staid there long enough; and had cause to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. Hee therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their libertie and proper lawes; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates euen ready to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. These perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betrayed the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke Armes, and fell vpon the new chosen Pretors; whom they slue, and made election of fixe Capitaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting onely the fugitiues. The Treatie was therefore againe set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied, eyther by some feare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman auarice in the sack of Epipola, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vse the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subiect to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the fixe Capitaines, that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercinaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Capitaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: hauing a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Romane Embassadors, daily p. s. sing to and fro. This craftie Agent perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spaine: and that if euer he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where else; it was now the onely time to do it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanish Capitaine was easily wonne, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approued at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had bene such, as deserued not to be requited with the ruine of his Countreie: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Army of Mercinaries, should minister

vnto the people of Rome, aduantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time; and obey those Ministers of Hanniball, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had bene their chief care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also bene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rafalicie, and some ill aduised Persons ioyned with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium; and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Romane Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain vnder-hand against them, with a Capitaine of the Mercinaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, & promise of good wage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthy, strong, and many waies important. Neuerthelesse if we consider the many inconueniences and great mischiefs wherunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by euill neighbours; and by that very forme of politic, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly asseme, That it receiued no small benefit, by becoming subiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not onely assured against all forreine enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrans as of olde had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering, the most worthe Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the ialousie, wherein they held their libertie inuaine. Neither enioyed that City, from her first foundation, any such longtime of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues not to make iniustice the more excusable: vnlesse we should approue the answer of that Thiefe, who being found to haue stolen a siluer cup from a sicke man, said, Hee neuer leaues drinking.

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was said to haue bin no lesse, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was maruellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vtouched; save onely the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometricke, in drawing figures, that hee harkened not to the noyse, and vpror in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder & a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which hee first found out. An Invention of so little vse, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artist better, than the deuising of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would thinke the monie lost, that had bin spent vpon a sonne, whose studies in the Vniuersitie had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded vnto the Romans, except Agigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hanniball. This Mutines by many good peeces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themselves as men expecting to bee besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and droue them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred enmie in Epicides and Hanno; especially in Hanno, that that hauing beene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal. In that hee had sent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, & to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside vnto Heraclus for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemy, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight; and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies, farre greater were the odds betweene the Captaines. For howsoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceiued some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclus; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine glorious enuy of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countreman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but onely looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did softly set vpon the enemies, that hee brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them backe into Agrirentum.

If Hanno could haue beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of Warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly haue beene reduced in termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leaue the Prouince; and some vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew manie of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Cannae, tooke it very haughtily, that no good seruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, & not suffered to return backe to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his Countreman the Numidians; & like an honest man, did what hee could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue bene, if the Armie lately ouerthrowne had bene entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his owne men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. Hee recovered those In-land Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Country; yet hee hindered the Country from reuolting vnto Mutines. About three score Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which Agrirentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as hee pleased, in despite of the Romans: not onely to the succour of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. Hee had (belike) receiued instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honour of these Sicilian Warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied, whilst Italy was neglected, that should haue beene regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spitefull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countreman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were therefore forth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Laetius, the Roman Consull, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these

these indignities; but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauored by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countreman had lately done, content himselfe to see his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agrirentum, and to helpe to expell them vtterly out of Sicily. The Consull was glad of his friendship; & carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had vnder-taken. For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; whereas they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noyse, thought it had bene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had bene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and sauing himselfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, set saile for Africke; leaving all his Armie and Adherents in Sicily, to the mercie of the Romans; that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Laetius the Consull hauing taken Agrirentum, did sharpe execution of iustice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaves, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessity of gold, than of Steele: which may haue bene the reason, why Laetius dealt so cruelly with the Agrirentines. Neuertheless the fame of such seueritie bred a terror among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yielded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered vp by Treason; and sixe onely staid to be wonne by force. These things done, Laetius returned home to Rome, carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agairna; that were a companie of out-lawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoyle of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their owne occupation against the Brutians; a theuillish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipios in their iourne against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall seruice. So by this enterprize of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue bene employed in Italy: leaving yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betwene the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metanurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicily, he had granted vnto him the honour of the lesse Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Prouince. He staid not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consull together with M. Valerius Laetius, who succeeded him in the gouernment of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consull Marcellus, by the Syracusanians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Thero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consull, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to allege, the Senate made such an end of the controverſie, as beſt agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not reſtoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracuſians free from their ſubjection, but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopefull promiſes, as laſt beene ſhewed before. The two new Conſuls, Macellus and Laenius, were appointed to make waire, as their lots ſhould fall out; the one in Italia, the other in Sicil. The Ile of Sicil fell vnto Marcellus; which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracuſians (whoſe cauſe had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not be ſceme hindred by feare, from vntering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his buſineſſe with them was diſpatcht, he gently vnderooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countie in times following. So Valerius, the other Conſul, was ſent into Sicil, whoſe doings there haue beene already rehearſed: but Marcellus was employd againſt Hannibal.

Before the Conſuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preſſing of Souldiers to the warre, and moſt of all, with getting Mariners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer fort, that vſed to be employd in Sea-ſeruices, eſpecially in rowing. Theſe could not liue without preſent wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treafurie to giue them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they ſhould be ſet out at the expence of priuate men; who, in this neceſſitie of the State, were driuen to ſuſtaine all publike charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into ſedition; had not the Conſuls deſerred the matter vnto further conſideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a caſe of ſuch extremity. For manifeſt it was, that the multitude had already endured ſo much, as well it could vnde-goe; and ſomewhat more, than could with honeſty haue beene impoſed vpon it. Neuertheleſſe it was impoſſible to maintaine the waire againſt the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italia, without a ſtrong fleet. Wherefore, ſome were of opinion; That, ſince the common Treafurie was ſo emptie, the people muſt be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At laſt the Conſuls began to ſay, That no perſonall would be ſo effectuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Conſuls, like it was, that the People alſo would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them ſhould bring forth, and put into the Treafurie, all the mony that he had; and that no Senator ſhould keepe any veſſell of gold, or plate whatſoeuer; excepting one Salt-ſeller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as alſo a Ring for himſelfe, with ſuch other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vſe, and thoſe of ſmall value as might be. This aduice of the Conſuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and haſtily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty reſuſe to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For ſince the publike neceſſitie could no otherwiſe be holpen; euery one was contented, that his priuate eſtate ſhould run the ſame fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it ſuffered wracke, in vaine could any particular man hope to enioy the benefit of his proper ſubſtance. This magnanimity deſerued well that greatneſſe of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conuenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie againſt Hannibal, and Laenius toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminiſhed, by long and hard ſeruice: neither did his Carthaginians ſeeme to remember him, and thinke vpon ſending the promiſed ſupply, or any ſuch proportion as he needed. His credit alſo among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the loſſe of Capua: which gaue them cauſe to looke vnto themſelues, as if in his helpe there were little truſt to be reposed, when they ſhould ſtand in neede. This he well perceiued; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he muſt thruſt Garrifons into all Townes that he ſuſpected, and thereby ſo diminiſh his armie, that he ſhould not be able to keepe the field: or elſe he muſt leave them to their owne fidelity, which now began to wauer. At length his iealouſie grew ſo outrageous, that he ſacked, and waſted, thoſe places that he was vnable to defend: thinking that the beſt way to enrich himſelfe; and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchaſe from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and ſome of thoſe, whom before hee had leaſt cauſe to doubt. The towne of Asopia yeelded vnto Marcellus; and betrayed vnto him a gallant Regiment of Rumidian horſe, the beſt of all that ſerued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater loſſe, then the Towne it ſelfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his deſire to effect; without getting the conſent of one Dafius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafius in priuate; and was by him accuſed vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuicted and charged of Treafon, hee ſo ſtoutly denied it, and by way of redimination, ſo vehemently preſſed his accuſer with the ſame fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuiled out of mere malice, knowing well what enemies they were; and ſeeing, that neither of them could bring any prooof of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not ceale to preſſe his aduerſarie anew, and vge him from time to time, with ſuch liuely reaſons; that he who could not be beleued by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the fauour of Marcellus. Preſently after this, the Conſul tooke by force, Maronea and Meles, Townes of the Samnites; wherein he ſlew about three thouſand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch aduantages, where hee might get them; the Romans now being growne ſtronger in the field than he. The beſt was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themſelues with ill ſpede in many pettie enterpriſes, and laid aſide all this while the care of Italia, to follow buſineſſe of far leſſe importance; had now at length reſolued, to ſend preſently the great ſupply, that had beene ſolong promiſed and expected. This if they had done in better ſeaſon, Rome it ſelfe might haue beene ſtricken downe, the next yeere after that great blow receiued at Canna. But ſince that which is paſt cannot be amended, Hannibal muſt force himſelfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie ſuccour would come time enough. For Masaniſſa was at Carthage with ſixe thouſand *Numidian*s, ready to ſet ſaile for Spain: whither when he came, it was appointed, that Aſdrubal ſhould forthwith take his iourneio into Italia, of which there had beene ſo long talke. Theſe newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their beſt, the Romans to prevent the threatening miſchiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his powne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Pretor, lay neere vnto Herdonia to get the Towne by practice. It was not long ſince, neere vnto the ſame place, another Cn. Fulvius had loſt his Armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonia ere Fulvius heard newes of his approach. As ſoon as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor; who accepted it with more haſte than good ſpede. The Roman Legions made good reſiſtance awhile, till they were compaſſed round with the Carthaginian horſe. Then fell they to rowt; and great ſlaughter was made of them. Fulvius himſelfe, with twelue Tribunes or Centurions, were loſt: of the common Souldiers, that were ſlaine, the number is vncertaine; ſome reporting ſeuen, others thirteene thouſand. The Towne of Herdonia, becauſe it was at point to haue yeelded vnto Fulvius, Hannibal did ſet on fire: and putting thoſe to death that had praſtised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude, whom he beſtowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Conſul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good chere; for that hee would ſhortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouertaking him at Numiſtra in the Countie of the Lucans, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clocke in the morning, laſted vntill night; and ended, by reaſon of the darkeneſſe, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many ſkirmiſhes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often; and ſought to bring the enemy within danger of ſome ambuſh. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and vpon faire ground.

Thus paſſed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, hee that latelie had taken Capua, were choſen Conſuls. Fabius, conſidering how much the Romane affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purpoſed that yeere to beſiege Tarentum: which if he could winne, like it was, that ſcarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore hee vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of thoſe Legions that ſerued vnder him the yeere before) to preſſe the Carthaginian ſo hard, as he might haue no leiſure to helpe

TARENTUM.

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannifium, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the coming of Adrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunity of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignity of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to bear soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to be at quiet: vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile; wherein Hannibal had the victory; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of make. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pefants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had bene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumcued by any stratageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did so vexe them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; wherof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight againe; since all other motiues continued the same, and his men had bene harmed by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victory; which he purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slain, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late receiued ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Neuertheless it sufficed, that Fabius, the Consul here-by got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Fulius, the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscantes, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fulius entertained in louing sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had bene authours, or busied others in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theues, which Lauius had lately brought from Aguerna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caunonia, a Towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, late downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, she gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistis, to doe what she would haue him. The Consul hearing this; and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitiue; and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perswasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister, wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie, especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he intended to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the most did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choise of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and broke open the next gate, whereto the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market-place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenus, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vied now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vfed, because of hospitalitie that had passed betwene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue bene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: wherof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols, that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caunonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this businesse was done, he halted away to relieue Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans haue lost their Hannibal; we haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul, he incamped a few dayes together, so neere as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote backe by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the iourney to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euery where; save onely at Caunonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue become rid of them. But their common pouerty, & disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered; that the Legions of Canna, and those vnhappy Companies, that had bene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fulius, were transported into Sied; where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had bene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of money: in euery of which yeeres they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare, or rather the best that they could hope for, was, to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him; whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer returned. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly deny vnto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their disability of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campanians or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eightene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselves willing to vndergoe whatsoeuer should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offer was to highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commendation of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute, it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill-deseruing.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then comming into Italy. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priue treasure; and thence take out the gold that had beene layed vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to provide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere, & the next were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, then at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driven to furnish the Armie in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was far lesse then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Linus rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Quinctius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spain, though he came not into Italy vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Cuma and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haue, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italy, where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had beene ready to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later then had beene expedient) ready to arrive: he began to doteate with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein he might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from harkening

to any sollicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Roman, and the wearinesse of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, then that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose comming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeere following they were deuising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Proprietors; partly by terror of seuerie iudgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wils; and tooke many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of engines; sending for a fleet out of Sicily to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the Citie: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no need to stand vpon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; reseruing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus tooke no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced; if Hannibal continued as he began to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betweene Tarentum and Locri, wher into the Romans fell: and hauing lost about three thousand of their company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no advantage. There lay betwene him and them an Hillocke, ouer-grown with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndercovered, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe, and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remoue their Campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neerer enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels; and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approach to his fellowes; who discovered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls and their traine. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians stay away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began euery one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe. The rest of the Colonels and Officers; together with the Licitors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slaine or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, couered it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custody of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore he sent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was flaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Rings; wishing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arriued there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where hee would, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needefull. The deuice was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the reuengfull minde, which he bare against that Citie, because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein bene betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent backe the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, & bade open the gates; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened, faire and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must be, to let them enter. But when fiftie hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, weretaken themselves; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Laetri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantecurors, made the Romans in all consulted haste, run to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoeuer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, & requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Common wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needefull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay forcere vnto the Enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the alloy of a more staied wit. The fathers therefore endauoured to ioine vnto him in the Consulship M. Liuius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Liuius had bene Consul with L. Amilius Paulus, in the yere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good seruice, they had both of them bene called into iudgement by the People: and this Liuius condemned; Amilius hardly escaping. Though it hath bene once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honourable men. For in the battaile of Cannae, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Amilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow that euer fell vpon the State of Rome; than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Liuius, hee is euen now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had hee bene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrie Grange; still vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Laetinius, being Consuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued private in discontented sort, as might appeare, both both by his carelesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors, to pull his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vied to sit silent, and signified his assent or dislike to what was proposed, either in short formal words, or in pulling from side to side, when the house was diuided. At length it hapned, that in some buisnesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood vp, and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had bene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather feared to fill vp the number, than to answer to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had euen spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to say; that it was great pittie, so worthy and able a man, as this Liuius, had bene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common wealth stood in great neede; yet had not vied in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian; and since, neither Fabius, nor Patricius Laetinius, being both of them Patricians, could be ioined with Claudius Nero: euery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two finer men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Liuius. But Liuius would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases he testified their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested iniuries done by the People, and repaid good for euill; hee was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men breake in faire weather; but run vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulness, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the second King of Spain his dealing with the Duke of Alma. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, vpon some small offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the seruice of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisdom often taught by necessitie.

It was a dangerous yeere toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to haue the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans vied at this time the seruice of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leaue and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure serued in Spain, two in Sicily, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in several parts of Italy, where neede seemed to require, that onely two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obseruance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Liuius would not fire out of Rome, against so mightie a power as followed Asdrubal, until he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeere, among the Cisalpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Liuius; to whom the warre against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salenines; nere vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie, that was sent against Hannibal. Neuertheless the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Liuius, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was already passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genoa, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to ioine with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would aduenture no further, then hee safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie, each, his seuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had beene, when L. Amilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they stood in feare; left all diligence, wisdom and valour should proue too little. For since few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not bene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should retorne home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreame difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Canna: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riuer and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenies at his first letting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a peniue traine of Mouines: thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispinus, vpon whom in the like fort they had giuen attendance the last yeere; but saw neither of them retorne aliuie, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Livius, that he should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answere, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victory; or by seeing the ouerthrow of his owne vniust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the ioy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the ouerthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spaine by Scipio, a little before he tooke his iourne into Italie; such mention hath already beene made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Liuie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historic concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Capitaines that were sent from the Citie of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the aduantage of their owne side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worlthe sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindred his courtes vnderaken, it cannot be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicill with Mutines, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Island: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needefull, by these mischieuous Partisans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more carnell malice. Neuerthelesse Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His iourne into Italie being resolved vpon: he lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of siluer; whence hee was to furnish his expedition. Thither came Scipio: and drew him out of his Campe, though hee were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Capitaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue bene so great, as it must haue bene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his mony, with his Elephants before him: but staid behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tages. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenies: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the

the sonne of Gisco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Euer would Scipio haue stopped him in his iourne by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountaines: But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had sent to keepe the Pyrenies as the defense of hard passages commonly is to no good effect; he was not letted in his voyage: by any such impediment. Comming into Gaul, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affraid, that he to him to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made: but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countrey, whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iourne ouer the Alpes, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he traualled through their Countrey. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily persuaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their catails, and to make spoyle of that little wealth, which they had painefullly scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in proceesse of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre distoynd asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alpes did onely lye in the way: they gladly consented, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gauls. The Lygarians also ioynd with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done; if he had arrived in their Countrey. There was no other Roman Armie neere, then L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia, a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first brist of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintering camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speede he could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about fortie thousand foot, and fife hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countrey of the Brutians, there to increase his forces; which were otherwile too weak for the iourne intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuerthelesse he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driuen to retorne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Armie, he assayed againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, having Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Ufusus to Cannusium, where he fate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrey very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Cannusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once hee had gotten in the same open Countrey. If this had so fallen out; Rome would haue bene vincible for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to win any second victory, in the naked Champs about Canna; if such an armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength, and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilst Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. They gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placetia, and drew on-wards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Linus the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing joyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioynd as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that whosoever the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate aduenture, than to suffer the coniunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilence influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within few yeeres, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe seruice in such a needefull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choyce of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would onely step aside, to doe some small piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which hee was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with victuals, and all other necessities for his Armie. Linus the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Sens Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe dayes Nero had finished his iourne thither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his coming. Linus thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemy, perceiuing this access of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done: and a token giuen, that the Colonels, Captaines, and all Souldiers, as well horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; should be lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that ioynd with them on the way. Neuerthelesse, it was not needefull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should be enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few dayes after their wearie iourne, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might beimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiuing that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue bene vndertaken, without this their coming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generals pavilion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had bene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted drifing, after a long iourne. Hereupon he beganne to withdraw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gave order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified the truth; yet though there good obseruation be made, whether the Enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath bene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded onely once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the

the quarter of Linus the Consul. Here Asdrubal greatly misde: and being well acquainted with the Roman Orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, hee was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke, till hee might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces; hee had not cited hitherto, how neere he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-trongly supplying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceiued, that somewhat was fallen out betwixt his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to retire a litle further off. So hee dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the Riuer Metaurus; whereby to keep himselfe as long as he could, from necessity of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Forde; or whether his carriages were too heauie, and hindered his speede: farre he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman horse, and shued him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouer-taken with necessity to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gauls, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he flood himselfe with his Africans & Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midt; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Linus of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was vnto the vanquished. Onely the Romans herein seemed to haue had the better in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to haue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Linus the Consul with a proud brauery, to giue charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midt. Linus therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gauls; that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiuing that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Linus: which hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victory to be manifested on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ranne all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof; disordered the Enemies, and putt all to rowe. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid on on every side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gauls escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken alive: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode with them. For when any of them, being sore wounded, beganne to waxe vntuly, and rush backe vpon their own battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betwene the eares, in the ioynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith he killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedy way of preventing such harmes as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the Equidrons following them; is said to haue bene the deuce of Asdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Linus. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother; to haue stricken with great patience, against many difficulties; wherinto he tell fall by the means of those Capitaines that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting bravely, he was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Linus, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Linus saith; that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Cannae; that is to say, fixe thousand of them were slaine, five thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and about foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at liberie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand; and of the boote, that it was exceeding great; to wit not onely in other kindes, but in gold and silver. Concerning the boote; Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is so haue bene as rich as Linus reporteth it; for Asdrubal carried well stored with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Asdrubal, a parallel vnto that of Cannae) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side; and two thousand of the Roman; to haue bene slaine. The number of the prisoners hee doth not mention; but onely saith, That some of the Carthaginian Rapiers were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme that they were all Barchines; forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Countrey, about their liues.

The ioy of this victorie was no lesse in Rome, then had bene the feare of the event. For euer since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Armie; the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great aduerture, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staid behinde, much weakened, and without a Generall? This did they talke; yet referring their iudgement vnto the success; with libertie to appraise or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane time the people filled the Market place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting still ready at hand vpon the Magistrats; as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would aske every ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of this victorie came, there were not many that would beleue it. Afterwards when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed; there was not onely great and ioyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their priuate businesse, making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians; and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had happened. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of the misadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal; especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and faire different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generals, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were faire more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terror of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That hee forgot himselfe, being over-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Asdrubal, that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrey of the Brutians; and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remooue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For hee wanted men to defend defend so many places as hee held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compass in the vrmost corner of Italie; it being a Countrey of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vntied; or because it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their haruest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Consul tarried among the Cisalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer, there to let things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Armie in that Prouince; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leaue to returne home; and that hee might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as hee well deserved. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victorie: order was giuen, that not onely Linus with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero, though leauijg his Armie behinde him, to comfort Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Linus made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers, because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse-backe, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Furius Philo, and Q. Caelius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, the due acknowledgement of their good seruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls; and Consuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthe of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this yeere, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; save onely the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surpris. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceiued of him; that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himselfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius; whom Linus therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, he obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct; and that leading an Armie, compounded of so many sundrie Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they neuer fell to sedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Linus addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians; which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore appaant, that by his proper worth and vertue, hee kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and boote: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leaue him, vntill hee be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spain.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driuen by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

MAGO and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, took vpon them the charge of Spain, when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italie. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Baleares; there to leaue a supply of men:

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himselfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meane to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Magno had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (of the same perhaps that had lately bene employed in Sicily) who brought new forces out of Africke, and came to succed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not unlike that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of Amilcar, whose authoritie had bene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home; or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanno tooke the field, and led Magno with him; as purposing altho to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Country of the Celiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other persuasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while continued himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentive, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Italie, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Magno, among the Celiberians: he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celiberians, who became his guides, that their Countymen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neere to these Celiberians: and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gaue them such an ouerthrow, that Hanno and Magno coming to their succour, in stead of heartning and reinforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Magno fauced himselfe with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies iourney brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celiberians, they knew better how to make thurst, and fauced most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie stood, by the comming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intenuie to the necessity and successe of his Countymen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might hee well aduenture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued vnder Hannibal, and those that had bene sent ouer into Africke; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noyed abroad, That all which had followed Asdrubal into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprise in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore vsed the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindred the enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio tooke by assault the Towne of Orisia.

Against the next yeeres danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Armie: and spared not cost, nor trauaile, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With seuentie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleue, that he could hardly haue raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore hee needed it needfull to vie the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtfull, of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one Celchus, that was Lord of eight and twenty Townes, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his seruice: he resolved to make vse of those, and some few others, that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee able to doe any great harme, if they would reuolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, hee fought out the Enemy; heere vnto whom hee tooke encamped. At his first comming, Magno and Masaniissa fell vpon him; with hope to take him vnprepared, whilst he was making his lodgings. But hee layed certaine troups of horse in court: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly beooke themselves to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes betwene the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Asdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that hee durst fight, yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: Asdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himselfe into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the middle, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at some distance, many daies together: it grew to bee the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies long before designed. But Scipio when hee purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier then he had bene wont. Hee caused his men and horses, to be well fedde betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traue out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: vnto herein the same trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battaile. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans; whilst he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which hee encamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not bee discerned which part had the better: since being ouer-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat into their foote; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, hauing well fed themselves, were like to hold out better then the Enemy. But about noone hee caused his wings to aduance a good pace; leaving their battaile of Spaniards faire behind them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, eue only in number, to the Latine and Romane Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in haste, and fighting onely in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose, they were sorely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would faine haue succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places, because of the Spanish battell which was coming against them, though it were as yett farre off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Armie stood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards, hee must haue cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betwene the Romane wings: to the depth whereof when hee had arriued, hee should haue found himselfe inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battaile of Cannae. Wherefore hee did onely employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chased with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance ledde them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In proceesse of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lustie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heate of the day.

Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly : and gaue no ouer, till they had forst the enimie to change his pace and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderlie retreat ; and afterward againe , to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victorie to be extorted from them : neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished ; ledde by the obstinate passion of feare which harkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day bene taken ; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the sodaine, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men : but caused them, hungrie, and ouerlaboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe ; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he haue in the strength of his Trenches ; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Atanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subiects : many followed this example ; and soone after, two strong Townes were yielded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleue the more easily those reports which they heard from Italie. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away faster then an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter : for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seven thousand that with Asdrubal himselfe recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend : but wanting there necessaries to sustain himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore hee resolved to make shift for one ; and stealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence ; hee tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masaniissa staid in it) whilst hee with the rest of the Armie did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masaniissa followed Asdrubal to Gades : and their Army dispersed it selfe ; some flying ouer to the Romanes, other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were onely three Townes left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of warre against the Romans : of which onely Castulo had a Carthaginian Garrison ; consisting of such as had saued themselves by flight in the late ouerthrows. Hereby it seemes, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yielded long since vnto the Romans ; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes bene inclinable to the Romans ; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipios, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune ; it not onely rebelled ; but with great crueltie betrayed, and slue, the poore men that escaped thither from the ouerthrows. Astapa was a Towne that still adhered to the Carthaginians ; and which was worse, had thriuen by the spoyle of the Romanes and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeere) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo : Illiturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants ; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdabellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius, or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Marketplace : whereinto was throwne all the gold, & siluer, with whatsoever else was precious, the women and children standing by it vnder a sure guard ; that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being made : all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman Campe, where struing beyond their power, they were euery one slaine. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it : and many of the Romans consumed with the flame ; whilst they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there : but returned home to Carthage, with seven Gallies, leauing Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Majilli, a people of the Namidiens ; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the Kings Port : who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bethink himselfe, how to finish the war ; by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hereunto it seemed that the helpe of Syphax would be much auailable : a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procrement ; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also bin beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him ouer a Captaine into Africke ; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the Citie in time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Africke ; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lelius his Embassador, to deale with Syphax : who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Onely Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League ; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended ; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quinguercent Gallies hee tooke Sea : and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would haue bene very dangerous to him, had he beene defiered by his Enemies further at Sea : but in the Hauent they forbore to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud ; seeing at one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would haue brought them to treat of peace ; but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such Commission from the Senate. Hee feasted them together : and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entered into Couenant ; which in time of performance, hee as readily brake.

†. II.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell betwene two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duells.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath bene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end ; hee performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memorie of his Father and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that hee should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vsed in the Citie of Rome : for there were enow, that either offered themselves as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to giue prooffe in single combat, of the valour that was in their foucill Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controuersies, to trial of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orsua, Cosen-gemans : that contended for the principality of a Towne called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne : wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tanistrie. But the father of Orsua stood late seized of the Principality : which though himselfe receiued by the death of his elder brother ; yet this his sonne would not let it goe backe ; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, & old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in Spaine, to take vp that quarrell ; and that neither God, nor Man, but onely Mars, their God of battailes, should be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills : and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the soole hardiness of the younger.

Such combats haue bene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We read of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Thyſeus, Hercules, Pollux; and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betweene Paris and Meneſſeus; the other, betweene Hector and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene Dauid and Goliath; and others performed by some of Dauid's worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweene twelue of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Beniaminites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatij, against the three brethren Curatij that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauerie. In England there was a great Combat fought betweene Edmond Ironſide and Cannus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdome. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; al noſt vpon euery occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Blyth contending for the Duchie of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, betweene thirtie of the Brittons, and thirtie Engliſh: two of which Engliſh, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is defended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in Engliſh, French, and Italian Historiis. Most of them haue bin combats of brauerie, and of gayete de cœur, as the French terme it; for honour of feuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or whatſoeuer else gaue occasion vnto men, diſtous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake euen now, betweene Corbiſ and Orſua. Vnto these (we thinke) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betweene Dauid and Goliath; or that betweene the Horatij and Curatij: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Henrie of Beulin; Duke of Norſolke, and Mountfort. There was a combat performed by Sir John Anſley and one Cattrington: whom Anſley charged with treason: and proued it vpon him by being victorious. An. 3. Ric. 2. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort, and Henrie of Essex. The like also, betweene a Nauarros, & one Nelch of Grimsby, whom the Nauarros accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him, and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuſer, if he bee vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had bene due to the offender, if the accusation had bene proued; I cannot asſerme. But wee euery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) be overcome, Hee shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramor and Low, or offered to do, in the reigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, hee that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in Campes closés, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lord, made their profit hereby. For in the Memorialls of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings fixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vse when as any man hath had an hard or vnjust iudgement; saying, That hee was tried by the Law of Loray, or peru, ou le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by bataille, that great learned man Two, Bilhop of Chartres, did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men: as appeares by * his letters to the Bilhop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the iudgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this libertie and kinde of triall, was reuerent by S. Lewis, and Philip the faire; so that no man could decree, or grant it, saue the King himselfe. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Caranges against Jacques le Gris; and to Isabon Romero the Spaniard, against Moro, his Countinman: wherein Sir Henric Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victories; and lastly to the Lord of Chastel. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deferring death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces defences per une demerit. The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giuing the accuſer the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did faiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: euerie petty Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giuing of the Lie mortallitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meaneſt Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the fift had patiently endured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obiection and Reſtitation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe ſo many Duells; as are founded vpon more priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly libertie, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats; the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation onely in accusations for life, is become the most fruitful root of deadly quarrells. This is held a word ſo terrible, and a wrong ſo vnparedeonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the bloud of him that giues it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in halfe by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is growne to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kinde of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no lesse ridiculous) some ſo myſticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a flauie; the other to a fouldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any ſuch Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly haue made with him ſuch an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them, vse nothing ſo much in their conſideration and course of life, as to speake and ſwear failely. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuſe it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & ſworne to pay the menies & other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as oft as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them that are not Liers by Record, by being ſued in some Court or other of Iustice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised, but he will pay money by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein hee faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath bene made. Nay, what is the profit of those that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice; and of all they haue, vied in their ordinarie complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid bur good-morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wile French man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Countie) une merchie & complot fait ensemble ſe mocquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; A kinde of merchaundise, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other: and ſo ſure now-a-daies in fashion; and in vse; as he that vlieth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity vpon breach of promise; and those which men vse out of cowardise and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subiect of all our deadly quarrells in effect: to it I say, That whosoever giueth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath li'd, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more haينously taken, than to tell him, hee hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promisseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when he himselfe knows that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not li'd; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Russian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; giues it impertinently, and Russian-like. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publick with an vtruth: (it it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vtruth is vttered;) but all that is rude, ought not to be ciuillized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, that these discourses fauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to feare God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wife, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall finde ten thousand feuen-penic-men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance lesse, then any profest preserver of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie betweene doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem panna: sic nec fortem pugna: sed causa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as hee may iustly bee numbered among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe wee indeed take our owne reuenge, or punish the iniuries offered vs, by the death of the iniurians. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reueng'd, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death vpon our owne consciences; Animsq; in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne ingenuous and noble spirits the defence of their honors, being prest with iniuries? I say that I doe not, if the iniuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; do fauour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the Assailant. You will secondly aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honor to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can iudge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-mans giues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror; and the Lawes of God appointed the Deuill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England & other Christian Kings, haue seldome taken any such aduantage ouer men of quality, who vpon new termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble-men & Gentlemen in former ages, in all important iniuries, sue vnto the King, to approue themselves by battaile and publicke combat. For as they dared not to brane the Law; so did they disdain to submit themselves vnto the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it denoteth murder) that is had declared against a common Cur-purse or other Theues: Nay

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Man-
slayer freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require iustice by Grand Assize, or by battaile, vpon his appeal, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and heereforth faith (for I vse his owne words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-slayer) be conuinc'd either by Great Assize or by Battaille, vpon that appeal; the Man-slayer shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the Law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentle-men shall be repaired in honor, where an enemy taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vnufferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, & Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wives, and children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may be felonie, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why should wee not submit our selues vnto the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recover our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet againe it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to be much more fearefull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I say too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historie, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publicke good? In these he that is employed and trusted, if hee faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honor. But the acting of a priuate combat, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a trifolous one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the Law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is difficult; because euen and equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publicke good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Commonweale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue euery mans fame and reputation; as far as reputation may sustaine iniurie by words, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any euill words that wee haue giuen, and to confesse that wee haue done him wrong vnto whom wee haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that giues ill words in choller, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduicement; hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be giuen but to those that are feruile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsieur de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sat: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, where-with he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to vse his owne discretion in the reuenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honor, who struck M. de Plessis, pollicke a Russian coming behinde him, and (hauing the aduantage of companie, and his horses readie) shifted himselfe away on the sodaine, but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner: or whether Monsieur de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre iust cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wise man iudge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntarie; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sinnes to God) makes all repentance shameful; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay, voluntarie repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weaknesse. Certainlie, as wife men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie injuries or suddaine injuries, that are not offered from malice forthought, than reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valor; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For hee that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, scornes to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preferred; we may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we doe submit our selues in all controuerfies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chivalrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth homiebes, as that of Bulls do h, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Revenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of feuerall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God vpon supriceme Gouernours, than the permission.

His Maietie therefore (which Hennrie the fourth of France also endeoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could neuer doe: in beating downe, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly fend; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer more. And we haue cause to hope, that this honorable care shall bee no lesse happy in preuenting the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outrageous vanitie of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their feuerall degrees. There is much difference betwene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and such pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excusable by weaknesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betwene killing of a man in open field, with euery weapon; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias, though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer be drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouers violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by paysoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betwene committing presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile, and lying in wait for blood, primily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Maiesty now reigning, haue giuen notable testimonie of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talar: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporteur de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient lineage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hangman. Queene Marie, vpon a nobleman of her owne Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiesty, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artificers, euery Age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Author of the French Recherches giues vnto vs two notable instances: the one of des Elbars, who (saith Pasquiere) fit mouir Montaignu grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors idolatre; & Dieu permit que il fut

il fut pendu & estrangle. Whicaused Montaignu great Master of France to die, to content his maie (so with the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Elbars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was some after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly defended, and of great feruor. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, he charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marseilles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike trial. Hereupon the King (it being easie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, & of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure, yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Libertie, though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating fallihood in so great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignment, and condemnation: Belle lecon certes (saith Pasquiere) il fut Iuge pour demourer tousiours en soy, & ne laisser fluctuer sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imagination faueur, qui pour fin de se le submerger, & faire leison to all Iudges, to dwell diuises in them selves, and not to suffer their consciences to float vpon the waues of imagination faueur, which in the end overwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue beene answered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vnderferued, That hee was tryed, according to his owne desire, by the Lawes of his Countrey, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iustice, surmounting all other his passions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

†. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Consul.

THE last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People; and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sicke, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettie Kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell vpon the Suesetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Countie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Suero, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be afflicted with the like distemper. They had not reaped lush profit of their Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time serued very well, to enrich themselves with the spoile of the Countie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonels, that should haue bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellows, Albius Calenus, and Atinius Pnber, to their Commanders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Pretors; as if their election had bene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipios. But whilest they were deuising, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent vnto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further

ouer-shot themselves; led them to Carthage, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie iustice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deserved. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Towne; as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis; Hee caused Albus and Atrius with some thirtie other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; Hee called the Mutiners to assembly; and having them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inueighed against them all as Traitors. This done, Albus, and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were halod to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded; as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued every man his pay when hee was sworne.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue beene contented to bee quiet; but by the leueritie vsed to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them; and finding Laelius with all his horle to fetch a compasse about the Hills, & charge them in retreat; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to prelerue themselves and their estates, otherwise then by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio; and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes then formerly they had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades; and was met on the way by Masaniissa; who secretly promised to do him all seruice, if the People of Rome would send him to make War in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spain alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italy; and there wage an Armie of Gauls, and Ligurians, to ioyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades, without sparing either priuate men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, he landed at Carthagena, hoping to haue taken it by surpris. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned backe to repose himselfe a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoyle that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him againe to enter into their Citie. By this he foresaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vn courteous dealing, he allured then Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, hee followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for euer.

The Isle and Citie of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vnto the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succede him therein; and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his coming to Rome he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bene granted vnto no Proconsul; excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans, might not, by the custome of those times, go farre fro the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Caesar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so farre off.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Masaniissa who was ioynd with Scipio. The victories against Aldrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the money which hee had brought out of Spain into the treasury; vpon the setting forth of solemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, whilst hee was buisted in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reuiue the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which hee intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassages auail much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deservedly; saying, That they were the most happy of all their Countymen, since they being present, had seene him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadours were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deserved. Neuertheless, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince: there wanted not many, euen of the principall men, that vehemently gainesaid him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who seemed to haue bene troubled with that dislike; which too often causeth men renowned for long approved vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasury was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled vnto the defence of Rome it selfe; it need required. Hereunto hee added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, then it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spanish warres, as of lesse moment than the intended voiage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing suffered Aldrubal to passe into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which hee urged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yere a Prouince: which the Consul neuertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of money, with leuites made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise; he proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: for as much as it was noysed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honourable man a little spice of that arrogance, which in following ages, grew to bee much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleasure, whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicily might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, coming on the suddaine from the Balears to Genus, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italy, than that which Aldrubal had lately made. Hee could not indeed raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that hee found them distracted with ciuill warres. Therefore hee was driuen to make choice of his

his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vntreay Gauls, redie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the disperfed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay ready to bee employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Maga. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either comming to his ayde from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) laden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that gouerned in Sardinia. This did much disable him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, he turning him in his proceedings; yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him bee recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bene pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iuno Lacina, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punick, and Greeke letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamblers that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. As to great pestilence, infecting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue bene the occasion of this yeeres idleness, which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailously empoudered by this warre; and had already tried the vnmolt way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might recieue no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voiage, neither did he ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves, that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councels of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carrie all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wisdome that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe decciued: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature fortified well with the busines, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fuluius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne olde in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from diuers parts of Italie about seuen thousand Voluntaries. Hee had also prouision from the severall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canas for sailes, Axes, Beede-hookes, Hand-milles, and the like implements, Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmers, &c. Spears of all kindes: euery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afford.

Vnto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of five and fortie dayes, he had both feld his Timber, built, and lanchd twentie Triremes, and ten Quinqueremes Gallies; wherewith he transported his Armie in to Sicil. In Sicil hee found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Canna: which were olde Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauy censure. They had serued vnder Marcellus and Laelius, at the taking of many Cities, and strong places: in which regard, they were like to be of good vse to him in Africke, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly highly to their contentment: but with condition that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilst he was providing, to haue things in a readines for Africke, the banished Lucrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Loeri (for there were two in the Towne) being takē prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ranomed, & rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surprisid. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garriso, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Townsmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out, whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garriso to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Lucrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garriso: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Theeues. The Lucrians therefore aduised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacrilege: saying, that the like had neuer bene committed, without notorious reuenge by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint, comforted the Lucrians, and redressed the iniuries done vnto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principal the off-ndors, whom they cast into prison, and vsed according to their defaults: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her money twice told. But olde Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. Hee laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Loeri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the shurp inuention that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissoluteness of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were to farre viced, that tenne Legates were sent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that land; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Aides, who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hasted him on his journey, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Laelius in Africke, rather to make discouerie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. Hee tooke a great boorie; and strucke no little terror into the Carthaginians; who saw their affaires to be vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, That speaking with Masaniissa, he well informed himselfe of the state of Africke, and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioine with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masaniissa his revolt from the Carthaginians; and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans: Liuius doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferior to Liuius, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason for probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Liuius, if it had bene true: vlesse we should beleuee, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howeouer it was thus, Appianus tells it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masaniissa loved. Masaniissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to bee his sonne-in-law.

When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, hee went into Spaine, and there did great seruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubal daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was aduertised: and yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdom. Thus farre forth we may beleuee Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Onely it seemes, that howsoever Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet in this their countesie proceeded from feare, Hee thought it wise to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Liuie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken peeces of his works remaining) Liuie did follow, it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended by order of the Country, vnto Desales the brother, not vnto Masanissa the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanissa shortly dyed; and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdom, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himselfe Protector ouer the younger which was a childe. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serue: Hee, and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Litates by Masanissa, that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should haue bene glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable seruice, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not bene guilty of the iniurie by them done vnto him, whilst his Vncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed vnluckily to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Courtiall, waied vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdom. Neuertheless Masanissa still retained the hearts of his people: and thereby remained strong enough, to infect both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though hee was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrus, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrey, euen as farre as to Hippo; and when Lalius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good successe, than could bee expected from the good will of poore Masanissa; sent an Embassage into Scil about the same time, which was little pleasing vnto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, that he could not chooseth but fight for the defence of Countrey, if it were invaded. Neuertheless he promised to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could haue done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Aduenturers. Left the close laying of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought the best way to prevent all discourse, and set the warre vnder taken immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein he willed him to consider, that what hee had promised, hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having sent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voyage; which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, saide hee, Masanissa hath bene with Lalius: and Syphax hath newly sent me; greatly wondering vpon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale tales prevented all further inquisition, that might else haue bene made concerning the message of these Ambassadors; whose followers had bene seene walking vp and downe Syrus. And lest any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the businesse, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybaeum: and requesting by letters M. Pomptinus, that was Pretor in Scil, to meete him there; & hasten thither with his Armie. At Lilybaeum he agreed with the Pretor, about the diuision of the Legions between them, which to leaue behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certain: some Historians reckoning onely ten thousand foot, and two and twentie hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirtie thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to let them down: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither hee, when hee tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Liuie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Armie landed in Africk, neere to a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely asseure; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arrival, helpe to confirme the opinion of Aylander: who thinks the faire Promontorie to haue bene the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrus, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soone after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roused about the Countrey with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vially resorted, like as before hee had met with Lalius at Hippo: that was farther off; as it would haue bene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the trouble of a long iourney, and fetch a great compasse to Vtica, by Land; when hee might haue disembarked neerer vnto it. Neuertheless it may passe as a coniecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syrus, since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybaeum, to shapetheir course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustentance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified vnto Lalius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Army to bee such, as not onely serued to invade the Lands of Carthage, but thru a ready conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might he better aduise them to set saile for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuied, or to be leuied in haste. Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately bene chased out of Spaine by Scipio was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps hee was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction hee was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passable. He was then with the King his son-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax & to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance, and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which hee conueighed aboard his Hulks or ships of burden, and sent them backe laden into Sicily. He tooke likewise a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numidian horse: whose seruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceiue the vnskillfullnesse of their Leader, that had thus houlded them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno so farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a City of great importance, * of which mention hath bene formerly made, and late downe before it. Forty 10 dayes he spent about it, assaying it both by Land and Sea, and vsing all his engines of battery whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of preuayling. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter Campe, which must be well stored against the yeare following. Whilst this necessity vrge him to leaue Vtica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gae him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Leuie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neare vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse: which 20 ioyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dilodge. He chole for his Winter campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Naue. His foot men hee lodged on a Promontorie, ioyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men hee bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shoare: in the bottome of the Creeke he moted his ships; and there he quartered the mariners, with all that belonged vnto the Fleet. The whole campe he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the yeare, when it should serue him againe to fight. Of cattaille and other bootie Masaniissa had brought in great store, by driving the Countrey, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Come also hee had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicily and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The shippes that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare, especially with captiues to be sold for slaues. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neare vnto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the secure institution, which the Romans vsed in the discipline of warre, or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to illue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neare, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perchappes hee might be wonne by persuasions to forsake the Carthaginians. 40 It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen prooffe before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no lesse weary with satiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: he might be moued with a little entreatie to withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King, had bene highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was neare at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had bene invited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe a while: his wife Queene Sophoniba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoever it were, Syphax did onely make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africke, and so make an end of the warre: wherewith now both Africke and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue eare: yet being pressed earnestly by many messagers from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadors, he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the king, That the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cab- bins, bins, and couered with boughes: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed couerings of Matres and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carefully without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to fet their camps on fire, and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, he fore-saw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrey wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legi- 10 ons. The longer therefore that he thought vpon the matter, the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end he sent many Embassadors, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surpris, With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many olde Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idly vp and downe the Campe, might obseure the wayes and entrances, with whatsoeuer else was needefull. When he had learned as much as he desired: vpon the sudden hee sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre, without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, 20 to the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very peniue; as hauing lately perwarded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his Campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him? which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourtes these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in conceipt) the 30 losse of their hopes past, with that of victory to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appoynted to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against Vtica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting vpon the few, that he purposed to leaue behinde him in his Campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well, and betimes; that they 40 might be ready for the iourney. After supper, he appoynted such Companies as hee thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seauen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army, the other halfe he committed to Lelius and Masaniissa, whom he sent before him to fet vpon the campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualty vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the camp of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and 50 gae Syphax warning to look to himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly: that Lelius and Masaniissa, who had a longer iourney, and were to fetch a compass about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, & do their feat. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of Syphax began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed vnto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betwene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe, and others, that had suten vp late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were, nor giue any remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischance, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell vpon the enemies sword, which was ready to receiue them. Especially Masinissa, that best knew the Country, did great execution vpon them; hauing layd all the wayes, by which hee foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying onely what would serue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out: right as Scipio would haue it. He therefore lost no time: but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest backe into their campe, which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but thrust onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had bene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue iudged him worthy to be crucified. It would then haue bene sayd, that with lesse than one halfe of thirty thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires, had hee not bene only carefull how to save his owne fearefull head. Neuerthelessse Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to haue bene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would haue striven to shew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He should not thereby haue done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to beholde the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their feuerall wayes of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the darke: but they were not many, as after shall appeare. Surely it must needs haue bene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Lucius, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seeme to haue followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting vp the summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to haue escaped; forty thousand to haue perished by sword or fire, and about sixe thousand to haue bin taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of foure score and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next towne that was very strongly fortified, thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repair their Army. He hid with him no more than two thousand foote, & five hundred horse: which hee thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Towne-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeelde. Vnto this disputation, he well foresaw, that the arrivall of Scipio would soone giue an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; hee thrunk away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the towne, which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preferred it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adioyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done, hee returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make hastie prouision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them saw any means. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio; others, to send for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Armie, they might well defend defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, leuying in all haste an other Armie; and sending Embassadours to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their infortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was employed to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonuba went forth with Embassadours to her husband Syphax; who hauing gathered together as many as he could of his subiects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne kingdome. Sophonuba laboured so with her husband, that at length she wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, wages by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to serue in Affricke. Of these were made such braue reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they vied, were not to be resisted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleued these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole country of Spain had bene twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales pleased much: which the Carthaginian Embassadours helped with a lie, saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made vp an Armie, consisting well-near of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called The Great Fields, about five dayes iourney from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Armie, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to giue such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, hauing 30 the Italian horse in the right wing; and Masinissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing, Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the battaile. The victory was gotten without many blowes: for the vntayned followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Masinissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, euen vntill they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thence come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserv'd of them, than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindred the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, hauing thus gotten the mastery of the field, rooke counsaile about the prosecution of the warre. It was resolved vpon as the best course, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masinissa, with his Numidians, and Laelius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdom, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice, it seemes that Masinissa gaue: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne kingdome, whereto by Syphax: which to accomplish, it was lesse 50 concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Laelius was sent away with Masinissa: and Scipio staid behinde, carrying the warre from towne to towne. Many places yeelded for feare; many were taken by force; and all the subiects of Carthage wauer'd in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vntayned burdens, which their proud Masters had layd vpon them for maintenance of the warre in Spain and Italy. What to do in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was thir Enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subiects with any violent exaction of men or money; who neuerthelessse of their owne free will were likely to giue little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, that Ambassadors should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countiees. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: vpon the safety whereof they laid all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at vnitie among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not reiected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheless, it was considered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre, without any advancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come ouer into Africke, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the towne: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appoynted therunto, forthwith to embarque themselves for Italy.

In this their expedition Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in those dayes very strong, 20 and standing in prospect almost of euery part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible peece adioyning, he easily tooke, the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soone as he drew neare. But whilst he was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the City, he might perceiue the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: Vt this meant, he readily conceived, and stood in great feare, lest his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily laden with engines of battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most conuenient for assaulting the towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he hasted away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he 30 drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should haue come too late. Neither could he indeed haue bene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried a while to make a brauado; presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would haue pur forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserue his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea; it should little auail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behinde another, made a foure-fold bridge over 40 the Channell of the Hauens; whereon he placed a thousand of his choise men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and backe againe vpon any advantage or need: but these he couered with planks, vning the masts and yards of his ships in stead of raters, to ioyn them all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauens. The fight betweene them and the Romans that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which 50 the Carthaginians out of their gallies, that were lower and vnsteady, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, aduenturing forth from behind the Bridge, were greatly ouerborne by the force of the gullies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before for feare of hurting the friends, that were intangled & mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw vpon the masts & yards which served as arches to ioyn the bridge together: then rowing

ing backwards, they tore all asunder, in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defeated. The Defendants had no other way, than to fauce themselves as hastily as they could, by thrusting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vtouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away fixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauens, returned home to Carthage. Their well-come was greater than their victory: because among so many grievous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Lalius and Masinissa, in their journey 10 against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masinissa to his kingdome, without further contention: the Masifili, his subjects, joyfully receiuing him, and forsaking the vsurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore, being solicited by Aidubal and Sophoniba, he prepared againe for warre. But beside the intigilation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Masifili would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lalius and Masinissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in 20 possession, be the title vnto some part neuer to yniust. Hercunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that shee had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the gubrage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, belcued the Kingdome of the Masifili to be part of his entrailles: Lalius and Masinissa will shortly giue him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King, whose life and hollow friendship towards them, had bene conuerted into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masinissa knew best, as 30 being well acquainted with the nature of those Countiees; wherein, cutt to this day, though there be many strong townes, yet the fortune of a battell is enough to translaue the kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Army, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in haste: and few of them had seen warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troupes of horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were 40 seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at long h Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foyle at their first meeting with the Enemy, came vp with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and threw with ouer-charged Masinissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilst he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of horse, which fell to the files, and made a lane for them. So their battaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though he laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Masinissa like wise, and his Troupes grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused 50 him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian horse, that they beganne presently to dis-band. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnappily, that hee was cutt from his horse, which receiued a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsooke the place, and fled, and that their king, vpon whom all depended, was in the Roman hand. Masinissa told Lalius, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian warre, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chiefe city of the kingdome, whither he himselfe desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax, along with him. Hereinto Lalius agreed. Masaniissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the City to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one strove to get his share, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yielded herselfe into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suite, that Masaniissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lalius and Scipio from determining other wife of her, since there was his wife. But Lalius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously, so that at first he would haue hailed her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-intreated by Masaniissa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masaniissa, when they had done what was needfull in the kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministering to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not onely to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, vnprooued. He briefly answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe, calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, That Masaniissa was no wiser than himselfe, since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masaniissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masaniissa and Lalius came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcomed; and highly commended in publike, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masaniissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had riddle to her head, and that she was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to delect the memory of his great seruices already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masaniissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio, whom he neuertheless entreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not be deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called vnto him a seruant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes vse then to haue in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them vnwilling to liue:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message; That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserue her from falling alieue into the hands of the Romans, willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her life.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, she onely sayd; That if her husband had no better token to send vnto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might haue dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funerall. And herewithall she boldly dranke off the poyson. Thus Lalius reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath bene spoken before, concerning the precontract betwene Masaniissa and Sophonisba. He sayth, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Lalius and Masaniissa vpon their way thither, yielding vp their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masaniissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masaniissa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masaniissa sayd, she was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masaniissa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her, wherein he should haue no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masaniissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliuer her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gaue vnto her a cup of poyson, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should haue apprehended her. So he shewed vnto the Romans her dead body, which he royally intred. The sudden violence of Masaniissa his loue, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him: adde not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cause (which Linius notes) of the sudden falling out betwene him and the Carthaginians, vnder whom he had bin trained vp, and done them great seruice. Howfoeuer it were, Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masaniissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should leade him to some inconuenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeede the ready way to diuert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to smile vpon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took vpon them to create or proclaime a King. Which honour though Masaniissa well deserved: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefite; neither should he haue bene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax his dominions. It seemeth not vnlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his troupe of horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might neuertheless haue recovered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subiects, without other helpe; when Syphax had once or twice bene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his kingdome, it was no more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they haue with a fitter opportunity, than of such a man, vpon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masessii were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noyed abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politicke sort of grauitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their saluting him by the name of King, had bene a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the sonne of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speake more) which held some peece of his fathers kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserue their loue, requested their withall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of suite: yet the Roman Senate was punitions herein, and answered very grauely, That it was not their custome to giue the honour of that appellation, saue onely vnto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; & in proesse of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefite vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the salutation by that name, though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians desire Truce, and breake it.

The Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallen their good friend Syphax; and vnderstood that Masaniissa their immortall enemy, had got possession of his kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians

nians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the citie, which were their Priuy Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not onely prostrate themselves on the ground, but kissed the "feet of him, and of those that sat in Councell with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to haue vniually broken the Peace betwene them and Rome; and to haue deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, where to all men are subiect, they would shew mercy vnto the City of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be ouerthrowne. Herewithal they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appoynement had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appeares, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired worke in hand, of suing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men: ouer those that were subiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made such adoration to the Romans, in their owne necessity; vnlesse they themselves had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnknewen to Scipio or to his assistants, in what poore case the city of Rome then was; and how vnable to defray the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, norwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately bene. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrust the walles of Carthage, though Utica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and tolde them, That though hee came into Africke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace: yet hauing the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations vnderstand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Iustice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these: That they should render vp vnto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegades and fugitive slaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaulle: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland betwene Italie and Africke: That they should deliuer vp all their shippes of warre, save twentie; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gaue them three dayes: and when they had appoynted them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masaniissa was dismissed, and went home into his kingdome, as if the warre had bene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Laelius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy, and gaue hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an holy day appoynted for thanksgiving and supplication to their gods. Laelius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masaniissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African warre, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Nimidiens, such as were now his subiects and prisoners in Rome; that they might be bestowed vpon him, who by so rendering them to liberty, should doe an acte very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not backward with Masaniissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should doe for him, they called him King againe, released his Nimidiens that were captiues; and sent him two purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other Presents, as in time of their poverty might serue to testify their good will. Scarcely were these and Laelius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the citie, but were lodged without: vntill Laelius being sent for, came backe from Offia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Minerva, that stood in the Suburbs. The crand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was onely to winne time, and get respite for warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italie, either to chase the Romans out of Africke, or to obtaine peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betwene them and Lulitius Casulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since bene any warre at all, betwene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leaue from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum; and after that aduentured in like sort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Casulus, might hereafter stand in force, as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jest of a warre, that had bene so terrible: Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Lulitius, and other passages following betwene the two Cities. But they excused themselves by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gaine time, vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Laelius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiving aduertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed betwene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gaue him licence to enuoy, to proceede vnto conclusion. This may with good reason be believed, since it was not vnknewen, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must run vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battell betwene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africke were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came backe from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicill, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africke, to victual the Roman Campe, was ouer-taken by foule weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wrecke, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as wee finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them; saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seemes) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than mere mockery, and therefore cared not for obseruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women and boyes, to be mulling in vproores; the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out vnder Asdrubal, to gather vp the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recovered the station where to their campe adioyned) and bring them into Carthage, which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not onely for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, before saw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the warre, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors vnto them, both to require satisfaction for the injury done; and to deterre them from entreating any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace, vpon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, & kissed our feet, after an vn-usuall manner of humilitie, confefling your felues to haue perfidiously broken the League that was betwene vs, and thereby to haue deserued such punishment as is due vnto Rebels: should so soone forget what ye then vntred, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your felues worthy to be destroyed, hauing onely recourfe vnto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that ye should consider, how long hee hath bin pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians, where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stirre: so that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Affricke, and ready to giue vs battaile: yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall; remembering that he is a man, and not inuincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your selues against hereafter? What gods will ye either sweare by, to be belceued, or call vpon in your misery? What words, or lamentable gesture will ye henceforth vse, to moue compassion? Surely ye haue already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not againe deceiue vs, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves vpbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadors. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadors were very much delighted, in the rehearsall of that point which was yielded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in to ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calles Hanno the Great; or by the very reverence, due vnto the place of those that had vntred his liberal words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two galleies appointed for their safe conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage, towards Pica. He, whether onely desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publique order to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the riuer Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as faire as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had bene then in safety, since the Roman Campe was euen in sight. The Embassadors tooke this in ill part, not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them, in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose; which was to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal, they slipped away, and made him our-shoot him selfe. Yet hee gaue them chase; and had well nere surpised them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the shoare ouer against them, and therefore aduentured to runne their vessell aground: whereby they saved their owne liues, though a great part of their company were slaine, or hurt. This practise of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonorable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driuen to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as hauing none other hope remayning. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suite for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not bene giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was already landed in Affricke, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

What sort Hannibal spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of Mago in Italie. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italie. How the Romanes were diuersly affected by Hannibals departure.

Ver since the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Linius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slaine, were contented to be quiet all their yeere. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought wortheie of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul who followed Licinius, and Cn. Serullius Capius, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preferre his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weeke.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Affricke, wherein they were at no small charges to maintain the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happy conclusion. They stood neuertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paines among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe cold. Mago solicited also the Istrurians, and found them ready to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Countrey strong, it might haue proued no lesse needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Affricke, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romanes to employ one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Istrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Pretors. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe wortheie of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull, in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Pretor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout: and strained themselves hard, as if at that brunt the victorie should haue bene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the seruice of those beafts being fitter for such vse, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more auailable against those that were loose, than against the Troupes that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shoure of darts, and killed foure of them, causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy, that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which hee had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retraite, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length hee received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof he shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Army, besides those that dyed of the Proconuls Legions, also besides diuers Colonels, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hope of seruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. How euer it were, this victorie would haue much imported for the assistance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Asago with-drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarked shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burst out, whilest the Embassadors were deliuering their errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet a plaine dealing. For, said He; They thus now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italie; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled me to manage the Warre better. Scipio therfore shall not need to bragge, that he hath drawne me home by the heeles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and ouerwhelmed the House of the Barchines, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that, which after came to passe: wherein he embarked, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as he could take he slew, not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inuolable Sanctuary vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no lesse passionate, then men are wont to be, when they leaue their owne Countreies to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that hee had not led his Armie from Canna, hette and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the Walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue bene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding ioy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal's departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouerthither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holliday was appointed for thankgiuing vnto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for ioy of such happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had bene troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his owne Countie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the war from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would haue done. Wherefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred back vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had bene borrowed in time of more necessitie from priuate men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement, laid vpon those 12 Colonies, that for want either of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had had bene wont to giue for the Romans, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the want of their abilities. So confident were the Romans growne (though their weaknes was not as yett sensible to the greatness of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the battell at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had bene few daies since discharged, was landed in Africk; they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads; and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For bekinning themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax & Asdrubal no speciality of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by another manner of men, than were eyther of those two. The Numidian King had bene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-sculions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such Souldiers. Likewise Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sauing himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, flishr many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoiles, not onely of good souldiers, but of braue Captaine, by them slaine. Such talke vied the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell, with many that had slaine Roman Prætors, yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had bene first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Romane Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Armie, as good as euer had serued in warre, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

6. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio, treats with him about peace in vaine; loseth a battaille at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarked his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercure, and somewhat more then one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as hee did, somewhat fure from the Enemy; that hee might furnish himselfe of these and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In Land Countre, gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horse of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should be easie for Masanißsa, by their countenance and helpe to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that vsed it, prevailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further adds, That Metzelinus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector ouer Masanißsa's Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduocate to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Fermina the son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assaile the places that yielded obedience to Masanißsa. This Fermina as we finde in Liuius, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than to many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would haue made the victorie assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had bene so base as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for peace; whilest they had such a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cause by Warre. But when as they beought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, them, appeared greater than indeed they were: they cried they earnestly that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see the end of these troubles, either good or bad; and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal, requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces; Hee thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuertheless, to give them satisfaction; Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence done to his Embassadors: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Affricke, made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yield vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee lent vnto Masanissa; and informed him of all that was fallen out, praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other business a-part. Tenne Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his owne forces would but little auail him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Affricke. Wherefore taking such order as he could vpon the sudden, for the sake of his owne Kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and fixe thousand Foot, he made all haste vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lalius and Fuluius: who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such torious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Belius one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands vpon them and detained them; sending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrey, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyn, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this; & commanded him to vie them with all possible courtesie, & send them safe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; & caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victorie) far lesse honourable then the Romans. This notwithstanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Towne by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whosoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to doe, they vsed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no pece of crueltie; when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengful mindes, for the iniuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discouer where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, & brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trusting them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them whatsoeuer they desired. This done, He gaue them leaue to depart; and sent them away safe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the brauery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personall conference, and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that Hee would meet him thorly in place conuenient. The next day Masanissa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remooued vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neere vnto which he sat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a walled that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence hee sent word vnto the Carthaginians, That the time and place did fully serue, if He had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, & came within foure miles of the Enemy: where he encamped well to his owne good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines, in fetching their water some what farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generalls, each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well searched, for feare of ambush: There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had bene better both for Carthage and Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Affricke & of Italie; for that the Countreies of Sicill and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had bene lost, and of so much blood as had bene shedde, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreame dangers their owne Cities had bene expoled, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length; to make an end of their obliuious contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdome hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition Hee assented that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared; that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. Yet (said hee) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my victorie at Cannae, wonne the greatest part of Italie: and denied with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome; which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand heere entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes instability. I haue fought with thy father, Scipio: Hee was the first of the Roman Generalls, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke, that the time would come, that I should haue such business, as not at the present, with his sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, wherof I see hath many. And thou mayst haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knows how soone? Thinke vpon M. Atilius. If he would haue hearkened vnto such persuasions, as I now vse to thee; he might haue returned home to Rome an happy man. And so mayst thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will giue thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicill, Sardinia, and whatsoeuer Islands else are situate betwene Italie and Affricke, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans; to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt haue glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for vs: our owne quiet shall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully obserue the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must vndergoe for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou mayst haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but vntill to morrow night; and thou mayst take such fortune, as it please the gods. The issue of battaile is vncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele wee shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victorie, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more ado, make peace. And doe not tell me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours deals fraudulently of late in the like Treatise: It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee; which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrey. And thinking it expedient, I will alwaies maintaine it: like as I haue maintained vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie me, the Warre by me begun.

Hercunto Scipio made answere, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicill and in Spaine, which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre; but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes, which the gods by the final issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee most iust. As for the mutability of Fortune, he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence, or over-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plain, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had beene proponed, whilst as yet ye detained some part of Italie, they might peradventure not have beene reieated: But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit vnto you any one piece of the same former demands, to which the Carthaginians haue yielded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the iniuries which they haue done me since, haue made them unworthy of obtaining peace vpon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldest be glad to make thy Citizens vnderstand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes eased. Onely thou must thinke, that in like sort it concerns me in honour, not to let them be gainers or sauer by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore vnto us ransom-free, all prisoners that they haue of ours; to pay vs fiftie thousand Talents; to deliver vp their Gallies; and to deliver hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their spoyling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these iniuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what an were to giue you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame your owne selues, for that I haue denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field: a notable march, and such as hath very seldom beene found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, diuided into their Maniples; or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was viall, might fall becke betwene the Principes; but he placed them directly one behinde another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or thole of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, hee gaue direction, that when they found themselves to be over-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their sight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie; there, by leauing roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to saue themselves on the voyde ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battalies, without cloying vp the way betweene the Maniples, which hee desired to keepe open. His Italian horse hee placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masaniissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vsing words, not many, but forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieued, since their coming into Affricke. He tolde them, that if this day we were thirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victory in this warre, should make them Lords of all the world; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whether they would die. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Affricke, that would giue them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: vnclesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercifull Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable hereunto, haue neuer beene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than foure score, in Front

Front of his Battaile. Next behind these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Balears and Adabres. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interested in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More then the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelius, in his owne right wing hee bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masaniissa. He was indeed farre too weake for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Mazarullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the 4. thousand of Masaniissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leued in the halfe of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that hee could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the sonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteen thousand and vpwards, the most of them Horse; the aduantage of number might haue serued well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must bee faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers, whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their feuerall conditions; promising vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatening the Carthaginians with inevitable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Cannae. He willed them to remember, that it was once P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had fift of all compelled to runne away. He tolde them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; euen such, as for their daftardly flight out of sundry battalies, could no longer bee trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countrey. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continual feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chased. Wherefore hee entreated these his olde companions, vpon whoe vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strue to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations vied the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew nere together, the Numidian Horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwaies an vncertaine kind of helpe) those that stood nere vnto the point of the left wing, turned backe for feare: and ranne vpon their owne Numidian Horse, which they affrighted and disordered. Masaniissa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to rally themselves, draue them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Diuers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed: but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lelius the same aduantage, that Masaniissa had against the Numidians; which he vied in like sort. In the meane while, the battalies of foote advanced, and drew nere together with a slow and watery pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gaue a shout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to haue the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Roman discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neerer after the Hastati, encouraged their fellows; and shewed themselves ready, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leiue Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw thei hired souldiers giue backe, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to thinke themselves betrayed: whereupon they enclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified then before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retrair; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chafed by the Romans, and betrayed, as 10 they thought, by their owne fellows, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beate downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Romans and Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng; had their hands full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beate this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily flie. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to 20 ped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or saue these Run-awies. Hee caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaile, and saue themselves in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was covered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slipperie with blood: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should bee dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if hee should fight with that warlike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet enire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured 30 hee could therefore the Hastati to make a stand there to receiue a notable overthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the maine battaile of the Hannibals. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triary: He placed them, when they had ouercome the bad way, all in his Front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Corners. This done, he aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer hee had beene receiued in his life before. All the daies worke till now, seemed to haue beene a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also faine the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chofe to die on the ground, whereon hee stood. So that, after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worse: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of 40 Masaniassa and Lalius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue beene most happy and in needfull time. These vpon a sudden charged the Hannibals in Rere; and ouer-bearing them by mere violence, compelled them too fall Rout.

In this Battaile there died of the Romans fiftene hundred and vppwards: on the Carthaginian side, about twenty thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this last fight, is highly commended by Polibius; and was acknowledged, as Liuius reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage to take battaile with such disadvantage, hee could worke no maruels. Hee saued himselfe with a few Horse; and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage, from which hee had bene absent fixe and thirtie yeeres. At his coming into the Senate He said plainly that there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to lend Embassadours againe; and try the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. This this Fleet, and that which he had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to certifye the Citle; than with any hope to take it. His Legions hee committed vnto Cn. Octavius, whom hee willed to meete him there by land. Then sending Lalius away to Rome with newes of the victory, He set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by tenne Embassadours from the Citle: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, began to vse the pittittull gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Citle: and viewing it more in brauery, than with meaning to attempt it, He returned backe to Vtica, and called backe Octavius thither, with whom in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the newes, that Vermine the sonne of Syphax, was coming with an Armie of more Horse then Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermine seemed to haue bene both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not only beate him, but so compasse him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leaving fiftene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bene with Hannibal at Naagara, they should haue bene farre better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; 10 to which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access vnto the former, yet seemed wel to diuulge the Carthaginians, & imprint in the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadours from Carthage: whose behaviour though it was more pittifull than it had bin before, yet procured it selfe commiseration, by reason of their late fallie dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Nevertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious worke it would prove, to besiege the mightie Citle of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should bee taken out of his Landes; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Serulius Capius, that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as hee departed out of Italie: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicily (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restraints the ambition of this Consul Serulius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Province of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet hee needed would be going, procuring onely leaue of the Senate, 20 that he being Consul might ioyn with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authority. But ere He could haue his Fleete and all things in a readines for the journey, where no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tost at Sea withoule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consullship expired, and so hee returned home a priuate man. Then came the ioyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now ended. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so pious, in desiring Africk for his Province, that he said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, vntill hee had first his will. Much ado there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to giue the more 30 favourable answer vnto the Carthaginian Embassadours. Hee willed them to consider what they had deferred: and in regard thereof to thinke themselves well dealt withall, in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Governour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subiection, leaving also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treatie was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee That immediately they should deliuer up vnto the Romans all Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make no warre at all thence forth out of Africke, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countreies, Townes, goods whatsoeuer, belonging any wife vnto Masanissa, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored vnto him: That they should finde corne for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, vntill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should pay tenne thousand Talents of Siluer, in the terme of fifty yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obseruance of Conditions, they should giue an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choofe, being none of them under fouretene yeares of age, nor aboue thirty.

With these conditions the Embassadours returned home, and reported them vnto the Citie. They were very vnpleasing, and therefore one Gisco stood vp to speake against them: and exhorted the people, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intollerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this, and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, rose vp and spake vnto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwhile than the customes of the City would allow, forasmuch as he had bene thence absent euer since he was a Boy of nine yeares olde, vntill he was now a man of fise and forie. 20 Having thus excused himselfe of the disorder, hee discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves; had the demands of the Enemy bene yet more rigorous. Finally, vpon good aduice, they resolved to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand fise and twenty thousand pounds weight of siluer, in recompence of damages, and iniuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three monthes; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gaue iniunction, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisle any Embassadours to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what 30 their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and other of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counsailes. Afdribal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours, who related vnto the Senate and People these ioyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedonia: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite a while for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken for the Provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadours called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified vnto their King, that they found themselves grieved, returned the blame vpon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately been sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behinde his fellowes; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countreymen, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken prisoners in Africke, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endured so many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiection. As for Sopater: hee affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsaile, and very inward with him; one that serued not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answer: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre he sought, 40 and warre he should finde, if he proceeded as he had begunne. For in two maine points hee had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romans: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had ayded their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrells with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Easterne Countreies, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entered into the Senate: and Afdribal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessitie of sending Embassadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. Hee 10 liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Romanes side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citie; that had bene too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and himselfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euen at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romanes, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had bene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified, though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their 20 side. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Peritric, as they themselves might haue laid vpon the Romanes; if their diligence and fortune had bene such as the Romanes was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Afdribal made answer; Euen by the same gods, that are so seuered vnto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Consul interposing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindered the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace; for that hereby hee was like to lose the honour, which hee purposed to get by making warre in Africk. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with 30 the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had alreadie propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might visite their Countreymen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransom and carrie home with them some, that were their especial friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadours would choofe, should be sent our into Africk, and bee freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their comming into Africk, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuersie or disputation: The Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romanes than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romanes he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasure could haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeeres; it was thought meete to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collection of the summe there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begunne to pinch them; so as many, euen of 40 the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which when he was checked by Afdribal Hanno, and tolde, That it worst of all befemed him to laugh, since he had bene the cause why all other did weepe, He answered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but sometime from extreme indignation. Yes, said He, My laughter is more reasonable, and lesse absurd, than your weepes. For ye should haue wept, when ye sawe due vp your shippes and Elephants, and when ye bound your owne hands from the use of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romanes first obtained. This miserable condition keeps vs vnder; and holds vs in assured seruitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purses, ye haue thereof with them, being now the subject of our storie, it is meet that wee should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions. It was like to proue a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. yeeres, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest Kingdoms. This hapned from the third yere of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Selenus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolome Philopator succeeded in the Kingdom of Egypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. yeeres old, receiued the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaens and most of the Greeks; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Dofon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedemon, &c. the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found meane to make himselfe King ouer the Lacedemonians, whose Common-weale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebelle vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second & third yeeres of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolome, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, loone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens and many others his dependents. That Country, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue bene to the Spartans; and therewithall lay open vnto the violence of the Atolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Atolians were no men to be idle, nor were much addicted to any other Art than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, & (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie) the onely good friends which yet they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vnjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoyle of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Atolians passing without leave through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Aratus could hardly abide these Atolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the iniuries, wherewith most ingratfully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Achaens. Hee was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay a few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prator of the Achaens for the yere following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a part of the Countrey, wherein he might very easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neere, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne agayne. As for the Achaens, they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Atolians inuaded Peloponnesus agayne, hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. So There ioyned with them, in this their second inuasion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war vnto the coast of Greece: made bold to see kaduentures agayne, and did great mischief. Demetrius Phariur, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell vpon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, hauing gotten what they could else where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Atolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater hauocke in the Countrey now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when hee came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy reuenge: there were that vrged to haue some grieuous punishment layd vpon the Lacedemonians: who were thought vnder hand to haue fauoured the Atolians, in meere despite of the Achaens and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately bene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedemonians had bene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrival of Philip, they slew such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appease them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from coming to them with an Army: since their Towne was lately much disquieted with ciuil discord, which they hoped loone to appease, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did mis-vnderstand the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaens, Boeotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Atolians: and desiring to haue warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Atolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some conuenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whether it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day. But when the Atolians vnderstood this for certaintie, they adiourned the Councell vnto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, saue in the great Parliament of all Atolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how wel they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prator; that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man, in a sort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where hee prepared busily for the warre against the yere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promises: whom he easily won from the Atolian side, forasmuch as the Atolians had couened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, & Lacedemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce warre vnto the Atolians; without staying (as it were) to auer the euent. Hereunto they receiued diuerse answers, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Atolians, of whom they stood in continuall danger, sayd, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithful meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood vpon a needlesse point, and desired to be held excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the warre was vnderaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Atolians held vpon their borders; and sayd, that they durst not be ouer-bold, vntill that bridle were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedemonians, the chiefs of them solused onely, how to mannage the treason, for which their City had bene so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeeres together continued subiect against their wills to the Macedonians; expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of Egypt to reigne ouer them agayne, and maintayne, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Epibori. Of these there were some, that thought the publike safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preserved them: And hetero they referred all their counsailes: being perhaps a little moued with respect of the benefite, which might redound

vnto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part, were still desiring, how to make all ready for Cleomenes his returne; and sought to ioyne with the Ætolians, which were the most likely to give him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority and durst more freely speake their mindes : but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neyther did it suffice, that about these times there came certayne report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which their intended: fancying vnto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come agayne. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto to their greatnesse and lustre; which once hee had in a manner performed: But since hee was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deserving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helpes, they must continue little better than subiects vnto the Macedonian, and far lesse by him respected, than were the Achaens. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ætolians to lend an Embassage to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst haue made himselfe the Author. Much disputation, and hot there was, betweene those of the Macedonian partie, and the other opposites: in such a wise that nothing could be concluded; vntill by massacre or banishment of all, or of the chiefe, that spake against the Ætolians, the diuersitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betweene the Lacedemonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achaens, who had spared the Citie, when they might haue destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King, that we may iustly wonder, how they grew so carelesse in making choice of the other. In the one of their royall Families they found Agessipolis, the sonne of Agessipolis the sonne of Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne over them, as hee was apparant to his grandfather. This Agessipolis was a young Boy, so standing in neede of a Guardian, and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how young soeuer, should haue his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedemonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in obseruation of the Law, that they made this his childe their King, and appoynted his Vncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the royall Family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime, but made election of one Eurygus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdom, bestowed vpon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himselfe be saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Eurygus, to gratifie his Partisans, and to appoue his worth by action, invaded the Countrey of the Argiues: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and won diuers Townes; whereof two he retained, and annexed vnto the State of the Lacedemon. After such open hostility, the Lacedemonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side, and proclaimed warre against the Achaens.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, then the Achaens and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirasians vncertaine answer: the Messinians would not fight: all the burden must lie vpon themselves and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Aetolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Laedemonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Aetolians, pulling ouer the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towne of Aegira: which if they could haue held, they should thereby graciously haue offered the Achaens; for that it stood in the mid-way betwene Agium and Sicyon; two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Aegira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost againe; though greediue of spoyle; whilst they that should haue made it their fastene, to assure the place vnto themselves, by occupying the citadell and other peeces of strength, fell headlong to ransacke private houses, and thereby gaue

the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great slaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Aethian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Weltheire Count of Achaia; waiting all the Territorie of the Dymnaens and other people, that were first beginners of the Achaean Confederacie. The Dymnaens and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so well beaten, that the enimie grew bolder with them than before. They lent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and toall the Townes of their Societie. Inuaine. For the Achaens hauing lately bene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his warre, they had pccoutfully with-held part of their due from those that serued them therein. So through this disability of the Achaens, and insufficiency of their Prætor, the Dymnaens, with others, were driuen to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike seruice, and to conuert the money to their owne defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to winne vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Achaens.

Philip came to the borders of the Aetolians, whilste their Armie was thus employed a faire off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyncd all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier peece, which they desired to get in to their owne hands for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There hee spent fortie dayes, ere he could end the busines; 10 which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entered into the heart of Aetolia at his first comming in, it was thought that he might haue had an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts:
 and not seldome, that the importunitie of Associates, to haue their owne desires fulfilled, couerts the preparations of great Kings to those vses for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindring the prosecution of their maine designs. Thus was our King Henrie the eighte adfide, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of 20 Tournay: at such time as the French King Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the strong Ci-tie of Tervin was lost, and that his Cavallerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Karl of Eflex with seuen hundred Englishs was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The flay that philip made at Ambracia, did wonderfully embolden the Atolians: in such sort, as their Priest Scopas aduentured to lead all their forces out of the Countrey, and therewith not only to ouer-runne Thessalia, but to make impirction into Macedon. He ranne as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Aegean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, He tooke, and razed to the ground. Helped neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the rest, he threw downe the Statu's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrey-men at his returne; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to bee growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euento Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was looneabated; and they rewarded florthly at home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip hauing dispatched his worke at Ambracia, made a strong inuasion vpon Ætolia. He tooke Phœcia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Panimum, Elum, and diuers other Townes and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundrie skirmishes; and wafted all the Countrie ouer, without receiving any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Achaean Embassadours: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardaniens were ready with a great Armie to fill vpon the Countrie. These Dardaniens were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hæmus from the Northern part of Macedon, and were accustomed to seeke booty in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a iourney into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey; as had bene their manner vpon the like aduantages. This made the King to dismishe the Achaean Embassadours, (whom he should haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeere. So Hee tooke his way homewards: and as hee was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaied vnto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the warre against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves vnto olde Aratus; and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty, than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbade Apelles to follow the course begonne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choller for a time. He thought to well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Achaens there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and fending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especial friend; and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as hee continued to make much of Aratus, he must be faine to deale precisely with the Achaens; and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achaens, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conforme themselves vnto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to be present at Agium, where the Achaens were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue him needfull in a businesse of more importance, the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new fauourites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patrium and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yielded it vp for feare, at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymeans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vnderooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and ioyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That hee would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrein inuasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-hastie to beleue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breede a mutual diffidence betweene them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him prisoner into Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was sayd) maruailing what should be the cause, that he heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsaillor, thereby tooke occasion to suppliant Aratus. He sayd that olde Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he sayd it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out: For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very preiudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie, deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already conuicted. And when hee had said all he rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngratefull wretches, it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaens; and therein haue made it knowne what yeare, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your felices. Old Aratus graciously admonished the King; That whensoever hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to giue credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himselfe the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yes, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delayed to bring in the prooff, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and tolde what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracy of the Arati: which when hee found no better than a mere device against his honourable friends; He entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The warrellfull temper of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar; he had prepared a snare for the Arati; so tyling of them, he thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimney; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtilt workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip, Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the Targuettiers, and Megaleus chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonne to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remooue the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their rooms. Against Alexander hee went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumny and priuie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he vsed more finenesse, loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwaies in his presence. By such Art hee thought to haue remoued him, as welsay, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meane season Aratus retired himselfe, and fought to auoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; Hee was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore agreat deale of time was lost, whilest Philip wanted both the money and the Corne, wherewith hee should haue bene furnished by the Achaens. This made the King vnderstand his owne errour, which he wily sought to reforme betimes. Hee perswaded the Achaens to reioiune their Parliament from Agium, to Sycion the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his sonner: perswading them to forget what was past, and laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth hee intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, He easily obtained what he would of the Achaens. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand, with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as hee himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, hee should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, hee began to prouide shipping, that so he might inuade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians; that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe, euen by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracy with Demetrius and Megaleus: binding himselfe and them by Oath, to crosse and bring

Atolians had sped ill that yeare: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeares following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had bene grievously afflicted, as before was shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedemonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those mileries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seeke their owne peace: without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Atolians readily entertained this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty daies with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of their nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand, Leontius and Megalas thought to haue terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device sort to no good effect. The souldiers were easily and quickly incited against many of the kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noyle, and breaking open of doores, without further harme done. This was enough to informe the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the souldiers themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to haue the Authors of the tumult sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made them as if hee had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megalas were afraide, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repayre vnto Corinth, where hee might stand betwene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while bene wanting to the businesse, vnderaken by him and his treacherous companions. Hee had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was he growne so into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessaly addrest themselves vnto him, and received from him their dispatch in euery businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making slight mention (onely for fashions sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in managing the Kings affaires, hee made it his speciall care, that money, and all things needfull for the publique seruice, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the King, for very neede, to sell his owne Plate and household vessels: thinking to resolve these and all other difficulties, by onely saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would giue assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the city of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megalas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entering the city with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falshood. Wherefore one was sent to tel him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace, in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megalas to look to himselfe, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it wereto do some piece of seruice, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, hee might not be called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megalas, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more hastie than else he would haue bene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megalas were intercepted, which hee wrote vnto the Atolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was euen ready to sinke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the King vnderstood more perfectly the falshood; not onely of Megalas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megalas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megalas also, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flic, was weary of his owne life; and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Atolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Arastus, wrought very effectually toward their ouerthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold vpon all aduantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megalas, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing forie. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this vnquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning & continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following, wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified hee his Macedonian souldiers, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrey. In his returne homeward, he called into iudgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Townes; from which the Dardaniens, Atolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when hee had thus provided for safety of his owne; the Atolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Egypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former sollicitation about the Peace. This fashion had ben taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Countrey at libertie: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of warre, but presently there were found intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad fought to binde vnto them those people, that were howeouer weakie in numbers, yet very good souldiers. But heereby it came to passe, that the more forward fort, especially the Atolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their Neighbours: being so well assured, that if they had the worst, The lone of Greece would be sufficient for to redeme their quiet. They had, since the late Treatie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achaens, and standing in feare to bee more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly then before, to make an end of the Warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer vnto the Embassadors, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Atolians, if they had a desire to liue in rest, must first bee dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the midst of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battaile at Thrasymene. These letters hee communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him, to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian Warre. Heereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Aetolians; which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Napacius. There did Agelaus an Aetolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing Warre betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of warre, should lay hold on the opportunitee, now fitly seruing, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie.

Such aduice could the Aetolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatening them at hand: but being loone after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from observing and following their owng counsell, that they inuited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrie, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrie) vnder feruente of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene Hannibal and Philip.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canna: after which he ioyned in league with Hannibal, as hath bene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise bene farre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equal termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which hee followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Aetolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon such Conditions that might easily be broken: haue bene related in another place, as belonging vnto the second Punicke Warre. Wherefore I will onely heere set downe the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthy to be read, if onely in regard of the some it selfe then vsed; though it had bene ouer-long to haue bene inserted into a more busie peece.

The Oath and Couenants betweene Hannibal, Generall of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassador of Philip King of Macedon.

HIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with Xenophanes the sonne of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the sonne of Demetrius hath sent vnto vs, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Iupiter, and Luno, and Apollon: before the God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolans, before Mars, Triptoleme, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Earth; before Rivers and Middowes, and Waters; before all the Gods, that haue power ouer Carthage; before all the Gods that rule ouer Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of Warre, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betweene You and vs, that this Oath stand for friendship and louing affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, vpon Coniuration, that the safety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians using the same Lawes, and of the Vitians, & as many Cities & Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which We hold friendship in Italy, Gaul, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold friendship or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preferred by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates, be saued and preferred by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vitians, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaul, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter ioyne with vs in Italy. Wee shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. with all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtiltie, We shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Hauens, with which we haue already league and friendship. Wee also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which wee haue already league and friendship. The warre that we haue with the Romans, haue Te also with them, untill the Gods shall giue us a new and happie end. Tee shall aid vs with those things whereof we haue need, and shall doe according to the Couenants betweene vs. But if the Gods shall not giue vnto You and vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, Wee shall make friendship in such wise that Tee shall be partakers of the same friendship, with Condition, That they shall not haue power to make warre vpon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords ouer the Corcyraans, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthians, nor Atintania. They shall also render vnto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romanes Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make warre vpon Te or vs; Wee will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue need. The same shall be observed in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom wee hold already league and friendship. To this league if we or Te shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IIII.

How Philip yielded to his naturall vices being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punicke warre. He possoneth Aratus: and growes barefull to the Achians.

Hitherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, he might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatness of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrey. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath beene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking thoroughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly governed him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listning to doe what he ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should helpe to serve his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before hee should bulke himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Hereunto Apelles had aduised him before: and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boylike-courteous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if he might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunity at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reins in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betwene the Nobilitie and Commones: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forcin warre) vnto domestical objects, than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In proceesse of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strue any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his coming thither, hee found Aratus busied among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore hee consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Governours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the vnrulie Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere that hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would haue apprehended some sedition: vpon Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the people tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemed, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his fallshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear, to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But hauing already done more then was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should neede the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as hee could. Hee ledde olde Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There hee pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice hee did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Countrey. Whilst hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrails of the beaſt deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; Hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a litle; were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angry words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou be a Southsayer, thou maist goe thy waies, and let slip this good aduantage; If thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus hee spake; resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needes heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigon, which was his credit; then were it faire better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as he had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betwene him and the Arats; whom he thought more froward than becomed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as hee plainly discouered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise hee perceived, that in resorting to his house, He had bene dishonest with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countreiman, and a temperate Prince, hee had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this journey hee found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That vnholie counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But Hee would needes haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his Will, Hee seized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus instead of serving the country, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: Hee kindled a fire in it which hee could neuer quench, vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilst hee was thus labouring to binde the hands that should haue sought for him in Italie: M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee haue related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In mannaing wherof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. Hee had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another journey into their Countrey, with hope to deuide them, as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore were not halty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force, and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open Warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messene hee lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsailler and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that hee sped, the more angry hee waxed against those that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, hee possoned olde Aratus; and shortly after that hee possoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue beene knowne, because they were done secretly; and the possons themselves were more sure than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto

Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to be celebrated every yeere twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Heracles, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to haue bene encouraged by an Oracle of Apello: which is like enough to haue bene true; since the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achaens a marvellous dislike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take count for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleued: neither were they in case to subsist, without his helpe that had committed it. The Asiatians were a most outrageous people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were soone divulged, especially that maine point, concerning the diuision of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Asiatians should haue the country and Townes; but the Romans the spoyle; and carry away the people to sell for slaues. The Achaens, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make straight alliance with the Asiatians, as knowing their vnciuill disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceiued how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauocke of the Country. The same consideration moued also the Lacedaemonians, to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Asiatians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achaens his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially at such time, as their owne needfullie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himselfe the Dymeans, by the Romans and Asiatians; and recovering their Towne, after it had bene taken by the Romans and Asiatians; and recovering their people wherefoever they might be found, that had been carried away Captiue, and sold abroad for slaues. This might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences past; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen men to vnderstand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof hee was not ashamed; He tooke Polyxena the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serue to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time: for of that which hapned in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen Generall of the Achaens: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedamon. Abuse take betweene them, wherein Machanidas is slaine.

It happens often, that the disfaile of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopœmen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achaens redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a young man, and hauing no command; did especiall seruice to Antigonus at the battaile of Scellasia against Cleomenes. Thence forward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom or neuer at peace betweene themselves; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, hee had charge of the Horle: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, trauielling with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also hee so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of seruice that hee made the Achaens very strong in that part of their forces. Being afterward chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, hee had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Achaens to cut off their vaine expence expence of brauerie, in apparell, household stuffe, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiers, and sureable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afaire off; that were vncit in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprizes, or suddaine and halitic Expeditions; whereto Aratus had bene most accustomed. But when they came to handle strokes, they were good for nothing: so long as they were wholly driuen to relie vpon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: causing them to arme themselves more weightly, to vse a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for seruice at hand. He taught them also to fight in close orders and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files so deepe as had bene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vie the seruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which he first was Prætor of the Achaens; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedamon caused him to make tryall, how his Souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the succesor vnto Lycorgus; a man more violent than his fore-goe. He kept in pay a strong Armie of Mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta; but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Achaens, that were fauourers of liberty; but to strengthen himselfe by friendship of the Asiatians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedamon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argines, Achaens, and Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Asiatian Faction. Very vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindered themselves thereby from recovering the Mistrise of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his owne security, and no small hope of good that would follow, sufficed not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him redie to fall vpon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what hee could; whilst they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turne face another way. Thus had hee often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden comming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him faile of his attempts. At the present He was stronger in men, than were the Achaens; and thought his owne men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilst Philip therefore was busied else-where, he entred the Countrey of the Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the Lordship of Peloponnesus, as hauing stronger friendes, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to encounter him at Mantineia; where was fought betweene them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the field vpon Cartes a great many of Engines; wherewith to beat vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen sent forth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continuall supply, till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaens and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being so farre advanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vncruicible, by the interposition of his owne men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant preailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well obserueth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein usually the hired souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which lie oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, haue hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to assure their owne seruitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his prosperitie, haue good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their owne; whereas they that serue vnder a free State, haue no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forreine Auxiliaries are presently cast;

to remember the League that ye have made with me, and so keepe it; If ye doe otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedonia is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassador; and had the Towne immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euerie one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions. But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Gouernors and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which whilst they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Heereof the King had so liule compassion, that He said, he would grant the Alydens three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

§. IX.

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time both in qualitie and estate.

THis calamitie of the Alydens, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently embarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five months, but in the short space of five daies saying. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alleadged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africke; to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrey. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both iust and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hastened away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must bee acquainted with. Great thanks were giuen to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancie (as was sayd) in not changing their faith at such time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greeke Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts, had reason to giue thanks vnto those, that ministered the occasion. Since therefore it was an vnrue suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodian, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to giue them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acaruanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbors; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheless as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might haue argued Athens to be the least part of his care. Hee failed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the readie way to Macedon; and landing about the Riuer of Apus, betwene Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the Warre. Soone vpon his comming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craved his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilst hee was farre from them. They be moaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them.

them. For which cause he sent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces hee retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: onely some Ro- uers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Euboea, and some bands of adventurers out of Corinth, vied to take their shippes and spoyle their fields; because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Townes. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preferred them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had bene wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicily, to make warre vpon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had bene still their owne.

§. X.

The Towne of Chalcis in Euboea, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprize: wasteth the Countrey about: and makes a iourney into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon and his wife. Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Achaeans. Hee returneth home through Attica, which he spoyleth againe: and prouides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Aetolians into the warre.

Philip, returning home from Alydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to giue him entertainment, or perhaps before hee had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: he receiued advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the warre, and make his owne employment better. He grew soone weary of sitting as a Scare-crowe, to sue the Athenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Townes men, who repoled themselves vpon their Garrison. Heereof Claudius hauing advertisement, sayled thither by night, for feare of being descryed: and arriuing there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. Hee showed no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse he should haue left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) Hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all prouisions for Warre, which were plentifully filled. Neither were He and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their shippes, and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despite and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in pieces the Statuaes to him there erected. This done, they halted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be ioyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him; though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haste to take reuenge. He thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, busie at worke in ransacking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed-foote hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leaning at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descryed him a farre off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither : who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme ; and with all speede made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there : who seeng the many lightes, and other signes of busie preparation vsuall in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his comming ; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by Sea, and had no cause of haste) yet hauing in the Towne some mercenarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens ; they aduentured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this ; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. Hee therefore onely willed his men to follow his example ; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight hee gaue singular proofe of his valour : and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the Citie. The beate of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But he retired without harme taking ; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vse their casting weapons against him, without much indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments besides, neere adioyning vnto Athens : of which hee spared none, but nuxted the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Agina ; too late in regard of what was already past : but in good time to prevent him of latisfying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achaens held a Parliament at Argos, He came thitherto them vnexpected.

The Achaens were deuising vpon warre : which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon : who being flattered vp in the roome of Machinidas, did greater mischief then any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his Mercenaries ; and of his subiects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor ; a greedie extortor vpon those that liued vnder him ; and one that in his natural condition sinct rankle of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apegea was very fely matched with him, since his dexteritie was no greater in spoyling the men, than hers in fleeing their wiuers, whom shee would neuer suffer to bee at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her propertie, that hee could an Image to be made liuely representing her, and appaelled it with such costly garments as shee vied to weare. But it was indeed an Engine, seruing to torment men. Heereof hee made vse, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose mony he was desirous ; Hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfait Apegea stood, and there vse all his Art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speede, but was answered with excuses, then tooke hee the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apegea (who sate by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So hee ledde him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes : and herewith shee griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Government. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Atolians, as Machinidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans ; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former war. Of Philopemenus vertue he stood in feare ; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achaens, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a farr worse Capitaine, was their Prætor ; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged ; Philopemenus being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloued occupation of Warre : then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory, and waisting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safety in the Townes.

Against

Against this Tyrant the Achaens were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them, and had set downe, what proportion of Souldiers euery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse ; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilst he made warre vpon Lacedemon, He ought not to keue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect hee thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Ile of Eubæa ; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his device ; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans : Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis ; hee brake vp the Assembly, with euery mans good liking ; whereas in former times, He had beene thought no better than one of the Kings Parafites.

It grieved the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achaens. Neuertheless, hee gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries ; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had beene doing what him hee might vnto the Countrie. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauens of Pyreus, and euen the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into euery of these places ; that he could no more then wreake his anger vpon those goodlie Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So He destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble, which they had in plenty, of their owne ; or, hauing long agoe bene masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did hee onely pull all downe : but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be vntreucible to their repARATION. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon : and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia, and against the Dardaniens, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Atolians : to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the river of Apfus. Thence hee sent forth Apollonius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon. Apollonius tooke sundry Castles and Townes ; vsing such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which hee wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vnlesse they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoyle, he was charged in Rere, vpon the passage of a brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian capitaine : but the Romans had the better, and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in safety at their campe. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Scerdilaides the Illyrian ; Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardaniens. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them : and sayd, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon : but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countrey lay betwene the Atolians and Thessalies, might be perhaps auailable with the Atolians, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set vpon the Atolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and sayd : That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betwene his Master and the Atolians : so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to the defence of the Atolians, and yet notwithstanding had beene angry, that the Atolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same sort had they lent their helpe to the Mamertines; and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants; but now both Syracuse & Messana, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleaged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Aitolians: who if they drew such Masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and lend them such a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who sought to breake it now. It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were let on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. They affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few daies past, made Warre vpon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Heerewithall they made a pittifull rehearsal of their owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will, Aetolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athen selfe, together with Minerva, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the walls and the Roman armies had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They sayd, that they had of late made Warre in the Aitolians behalfe; and that the Aitolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Aitolians must excuse themselves, by alleging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to giue them aide conuenient: for this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemie, it concerned the Aitolians to take part with them in their Warre and victorie, ylesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceiued, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helpe ere it was desired, were themselves carried vnto the warre by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue bene the cause, why Dorymachus the Aitolian Pretor shifted them off a while with a dilatorie answer: though he told his Countrymen, That by reseruing themselves, until the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That ouer-much haste was an enemy to good counsaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, Hee passed a Decree, That the Pretor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude vpon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwile it was vnlawfull to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Aitolians invade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

PHILIP was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Athenians. Hee thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardani

*Dardani*ans; hauing with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was iudged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least beleue, that hee was not weakly attended. And this may haue bene the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Aetolia by his father, whom earnest businesse called thence in another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heracles, would serue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romanes, from doing harme by sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his iourney Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Atracians met in the Countrey of the Desfaretz, a people in the vtmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candaulia; that running along from Hemus in the North vntill they ioine in the South with Pindus, inclose the Western parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which hee had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romanes, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no lesse vnwilling to lose too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would haue fought. He had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambulls, wherein hee bestowed as many as hee thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines to prouoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themselves respectfully; as opportunitee should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambull, hauing fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had bene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so hotly, that they draue him to an hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the woike, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore presented the second time, leading forth his Armie, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer used before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about foure score yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to affright the Romans, who had neuer seene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romanes (whilst possibly some were yet alive, which had knowne that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes haue none. Philip had patience to let the Consul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater neede to fight, than Hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so neere the Enemie, that was strong in Horse, send his men to fetch in come out of the fields. Wherefore he removed eight myles off; presuming that Philip would not aduenture to meete him on ground; and so the more boldly hee suffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrey. The King was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romanes to take their good pleasure: euen till their presumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them careless. When this was come to passe, hee tooke all his horse, and light-armed foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betwene the Forragers and their Campe. There hee layed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there elapsed some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter

went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it ne: full: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse divided themselves, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canuassing the field,ooke their task where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disadvantage; as comming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might haue bene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an haruest, he wastoo greedie about a poore gleaning: the Romane Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse too make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to look to their owne safety. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are seldom heeded full of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had hee bene cast away, if a louing subiect of his had not alighted, mounted him vpon his owne horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foote was ouertaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashnes; and the Consul, with as much dulnesse, for his dayes seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the king from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were walled, they must needs haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought vnlkely, That if the Romans following the King, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as hee fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might haue wonne it. But that noble Historian, Liuie, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much to blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Arme lay fast in his Campe; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe, he was aduerted, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him aduerture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleare himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose hee sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But instead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Campe to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them a-wharw the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vse; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for euery ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruiceable in that case. But they were few, and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consul some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yielded for feare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Arme; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to waite vpon them home; whilst he himselfe went against the Atolians. For Damocritus the Prator of the Atolians, who had referred himselfe and his Nation vnto the euent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & againe: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were fallen vpon Macedony, grew no lesse buisie on the sudden, than before he had bene wise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time; and so, not staying to proclaim warre, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Asbianian; and made inuasion vpon Thessalie. They tooke and crucelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay disperfed, was like to haue taken their Camp; if Aminander, more warie then the Atolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time; the Roman Fleete, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodiens, had taken some small Ilands in the Aegean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Isle of Eubaea; and some other places therabout. The Townes were giuen vnto Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly bene made with the Atolians: so the goods therein found were giuen vnto the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XII.

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gauls in Italie. An Embassie of the Romans to Carthage, Masaniissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

Thus the time ranne away: and P. Villius a new Consul, tooke charge of the war in Macedon. He was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiours: whereof two thousand; hauing serued long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had sturied at Cannae: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing bene long absent from Italie, whicher faime they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the History of his yeere is lost: whereof the misse is not great; since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we find in Liuie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Liuie himselfe, an Historian to whom few we may reasonably beleeue, that Villius his yeere was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could haue bene expected with the Gauls. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had bene able to force, was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like fort Cremona was attempted; but saved her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that staid behind Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gauls, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italie. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the message might seeme other wise to haue fauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitive slaues belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and downe in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masaniissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masaniissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending then some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing bene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemy, Hee ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadors vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then buised with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedonia. King Masissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermian met with the Embassadors, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls: they layde siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should haue the managing of warre among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedonia: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his subiects, by punishing a bad Counsaillour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendering vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thercinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vniuersally laboured to find way into Macedonia, taking a journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) where-in hee could not bee supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedonia allotted him for his Prouince; whose coming was expected; and hee very shortly arrived at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage against Philip. Theſſalie waſteth Philip, the Romans, and Atolians. The Sicchaes forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was waie. Philip deli- uers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

He Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemy, as soone as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtile Greeke, the arte of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a litle while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted, many yeeres after this, vnto priuat men, for part of those monies that had beene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerse from the Macedonian Warre, and had thereby dri- uen the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse neede to relye vpon their Confederates. So they leauied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident vnto the sustentance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some ieaiousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it vn- courteously, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They saide, That it was not their manner to vse the ayde of their friends, longer than their friendes had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to asseorde it; That

That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadors; and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) due their best to perswade an atonement betwene them. In such louing fashion did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these termes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the sup- plily decreed vnto him, which consisted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had serued in Spaine and Africke. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his coming hee presently discharged) and king Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the riuer of Apſus or Asom. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedonia, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountains, which diuided the South of Epirus from Theſſalie, then should they enter into a plentifull Countrey, and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a maner) part of his kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuerthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likely- hood. For the riuer of Apſus, running along through that valley which alone was open betwene the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocks by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assayed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappoynted of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of forty dayes.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the war might be ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that hee and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the iniuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had beene long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, hee thought it against all reason, that hee should relinquish his claime and dominion ouer them. He also said, That as farre forth as it should appeare that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoever, hee could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the iudgement of some free State, that had not bene interested in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no iudgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies beene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Townes, that he would haue to be set at libertie; the first that he named were the Theſſalians: These had beene Subiects (though conditionally) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer since the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Theſſalians; the King in a rage demanded what sharper Condition he would haue layd vpon him, had hee beene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul stroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuayled against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolue what courſe to take: there came to him an Heard man, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vndertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound:

bound: and being promised a great reward, in case hee made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appoynted to follow his directions. They trauielled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discouered. When they had reconnoitred the hill-tops, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscovered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on their iourney, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonians, thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as neare as he could vnto the Enemies Campe, and assailed them in their strength. He preuailed as little as in former times, vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himselfe. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: hee made a stand at the end of fife miles, and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse of his Campe and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driuen from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, vpon equal ground. Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrey, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoyleing all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their king) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him, which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to vsee any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grieuously, that he was driuen to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitful Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him: so that a little hinderance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his kingdome of Macedon.

The Atolians and Atbanians, when this fell out, were euen in a readinesse to invade Thessalie; whereinto the wayes lay more open, cut of their severall Countreies. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they fore-slowed not the occasion, but made all speede, each of them to lay holde vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their haruest, could not find enough to maintaine his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to auoyde. T. Quintius wonne Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yielded vnto him. Rhage he besieged: and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it, so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recolected his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing well-neare spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Hauentowne of Phocia, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Countrey being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocia he wonne by assault: many were yielded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space hee had (infectly) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyined with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wonne two Cities in Euboea; and afterward layd siege vnto Cenchree, an Hauentowne and Arcevall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprize did somewhat helpe forward the Acheans, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip: since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Acheans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had bene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best counse to rid their hands of him; whilst being intangled in a dangerous warre, hee wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poisoning of Aratus their old Gouvernour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed, had caused them long since to holde him as a necessary euill, even whilst they were vnable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopemen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend: then did they only thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that hee was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceiue how they stood affected: and therefore hee sent murderers, to take away the life of Philopemen. But failing in this enterprize, and being detected, he did thereby only set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly dry before, and prepared to burne. Philopemen wrought so with the Acheans, that no discouise was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to wish draw themselves from the Macedonian. Cyclidius, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionat in the cause of Philip; and Antisthenes chosen Prætor, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadors were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans; making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans was held at Steyon, to deliberate and resolue in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Acheans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this businesse, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadors, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Acheans to vnderstand, That hee, who could bee satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell; who remembering the benefices of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sence of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; preuailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much alteration the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this warre. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into societie: with the Romans (because no League would bee of force, vntill the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any societie at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argines, hauing don their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of this Decree; which they could not resist, any yet with honestie thereto give assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argines had so little thanke; that all the rest of the Acheans may bee better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so hot a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discouered it selfe so plainly, in the behauiour of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citi- into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philopemen, lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Atolians. Him the Conspirators drew to

Argos; whither comming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude ready to ioyne with him, He easily compelled the Achaean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gave him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie, whilst as yet with his honour he might seeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly be chosen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselfe; and therefore thought it best, since more could not bee done, to pre-dispose things vnto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Melian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulfe of Ziton, in the Aegean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Ashtamanian; an Embassador of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Atolians and Achaens. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliades, lately binished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though hearing (as he said) none but the immortal Gods: yet misdoubting some treachery in the Atolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans were, That he should for all Cities of Greece at libertie; deliuer vp to the Romans their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewise whatsoeuer he held of theirs in Illyria; and whatsoeuer out of Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoyled in the late warre betweene them. The Rhadians would haue againe the Countrie of Peraa, the late warre betweene them. The Rhadians would haue againe the Garrisons, out of diuers Townes about the Hellepont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achaens desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniuult, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their consent. The Atolians tooke vpon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leauing it free, and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatsoeuer he inheld that had at any time bene theirs. Neither were they here withall content: but insolently declaymed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessalie, corruptly ing (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when hee was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Atolians, Philip commanded his Gallies to be rowe neerer the shore. But they beganne to plic him afresh: telling him, that he must obey his betters, vni lesse he were able to stand himselfe by force of Armes. He answered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing) with dry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Romane Consul vnderstand, what manner of companions these Atolians were. For hee said, That he had oft endeauoured them, as likewise the best of the Greekes: desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take spoile from spoyle: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Atolia out of Atolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as Warre happened betweene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by sending voluntaries to serue on both sides, that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece. Hee said it was strange, that the Atolians should bee so careful thereof, since diuers Tribes of their owne, which hee there named, where indeede no Grecians: wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romans would giue him leaue to make slaues of those Atolians, which were no Greekes. Titus hereat smiled, and leaue to what offend, to heare the Atolians well rated vp; touching whom hee began to vnderstand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that general demand of setting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatnesse of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might become his owne dignitie. But that the Atolians, Rhadians and other pettie Estates, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might hee should bee therunto compelled: it was, hee saide, a strange and ridiculous insulence. The Achaens hee charged with much ingratitude; reciting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honors. Neuertheles hee said, that he would render Argos vnto them: but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himselfe.

Thus

Thus hee addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall; vnto whom if he could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Atolians and the Rhadians, his late warre, (hee said) was onely in dispute; Praxias his sonne in-law; neither did hee see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than hee at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, (spoyling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Groue, and pleasant walkes thereabouts): what could hee doe more; than send Gardiners thither with yong plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus hee iested the matter out: but offered neuertheles, in honour of the Romans, to giue backe the Region of Peraa to the Rhadians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof hee had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and hee ill provided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being soill provided of Counsaile, said Titus, you may euen thanke your selfe; as having murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, until it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the weightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was beleueed, that he thereby sought to abridge the Atolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That hee would giue the Achaens both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhadians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Atolians, that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendered vp. The noise thit they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, he would suffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they mette early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendred; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome; where he would referre himselfe to the counsell of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintus would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the warre. So he easily perswaded with the rest, to assent herunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in Warre or peace. Further hee willed them to send their severall Embassadors to Rome, which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest he perswaded King Aminander, to make a iourney to Rome in person; knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confidence of so many Embassadors, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armes in Greece might be prolonged. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet hee knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleged vnto the Senate.

The Embassador of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vnder-taking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer bee effected; vnlesse especiall care were taken, that the King should bee dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrie, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruilitie; that the Senate agreed to haue it euil so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and beganne to haue made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the middelt of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors haue truly said, That neither the Aetolians, Achaens, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Townes? As for Corinth, wherto the Achaens had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain vnto an Other.) Philip had already condescended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue bene alleaged, even against the Greekes, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Successour had bene decreed vnto him. But since he was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to giue care vnto any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Achaens had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common Enemies; thought euen to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedaemonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had bene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaens together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaens; and therefore desired to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be wonne. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be assigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philotes the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a straight alliance with the Lacedaemonians, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the Citizens them selues he might be called into it. Hereabout Philotes dealt with the Argiues; but found them so averse; that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to robbe and fleece them. So hee willed Philotes, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which hee was ready to receive. Philotes accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argiues: who for very loue had forsaken the Achaens, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staid behinde, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Siluer. Also a great imposition of monie was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more adoe. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or played the theues, in purloining their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath bene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the neweste to T. Quintius; and offered to ioyn with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as heooke the paines to crosse ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meete with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some caill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romane sixe hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Achaens, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the final conclusion of peace betweene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended, which after this continued not long.

§. XIII.

The battaile at Cynosephale, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as soone as hee vnderstood that he was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre, meant afterwards wholly to relie vp on himselfe.

Titus had in his Armie about fixe and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie, and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, nere vnto the Citie of Phera: where the vant-courriers on both sides discovered each other, and sent word thereof vnto their severall Captaines. But neither of them were ouer hasty, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their severall Campes, with little advantage vnto either side. The Country about Phera was thicke set with Trees; and other wise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it vnproper for seruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue backe into Scotus in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully serued with all necessities. Titus conceiued aright his meaning; and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it onely to waste the Country. There lay betweene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neurtherlesse they encamped not farre alunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where hee found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discoverers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worfe. But Philip anon fnt in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Aetolians had not bene desperate, the Romans their fellowes had bene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thicke and tumultuously, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his owne; if hee could vse an occasion, the like whereof hee should not often finde. This caused him to alter his purpose: in so much as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp those hills, which forthat the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynosephale. As soone as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the very Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. Hee had also libertie to choos his ground, as might serue best his advantages: forasmuch as the Romans were quite driuen from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, seruing nothing apply for his phalanx. Neurtherlesse hee found conuenient room, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the rest, embattailing them as they might. Whilest he was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrink; as being faine vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to recoyle. Hee fets forward to helpe them; and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour; hauing the Romans not farre behinde them.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill, Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece

with Cycliades the banished Archaian in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadors vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in priuate with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seemed that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto him a Truce for fifteen daies: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman Generall. In the same season many suspicious rumors went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of these rumors the Asolians were chief authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honestie, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters vnto his Associates; willing them to haue their Agents ready by a time appointed at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty should bee held. There when they were all assembled, they entered into consultation before the Kings arrivall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for euery estate in particular. The poore King Aminander belought them all, & especially the Romans, that they would thinke vpon him; and considering his weaknesse which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander one of the Asolians: who commending Titus for much as he had thus assembled the Confederates to aduise vpon their owne good, and had willed them to deliuer their mindes free: added, That in the maine of the purpose which he had in hand, he was vterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greekes of their liberty. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the warre, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the faire promises made by Titus himselfe vnto the Greekes, than the chafing of Philip quite out of his Kingdom. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Asolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the utter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessitie, to take such a rigorous course. And heereof hee alleaged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victorie, to generous mindes, was it onely an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publike benefit of Greece: it was (he said) expedient, that the Kingdom of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be vterly destroyed: forasmuch as it feared as a barre to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other savage Nations, which would soone ouer-flow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdom were not interposed. Wherefore hee concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, wherewith hee had pressed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Asolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take the counsaile a part for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phaezus, another of the Asolians, to say, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no lesse than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leaue his babbling, saying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip, were he neuer so malicious, should thenceforth not haue it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vsed friendly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had been required at his hands; offering yet further to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phaezus the Asolian, insulking ouer him, said it was to bee hoped, that hee would then at length giue vp to the Asolians a many of townes (which he there named) bidding him speake whether he would, or no. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himselfe, said it should be otherwise; These were Thessalian Townes, and should be all free: one of them onely excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit itselfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be giuen to the Asolians. Heereat Phaezus cried out, that it was too great an iniurie, thus to bee defrauded of the Townes

Townes that had sometime belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather hee willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Covenant betwixt them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing save the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had beene such a Condition in the former warre; but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Asolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus saide to vnderstand asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had lein in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subiection of the Asolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted, with these gangry passages betweene the Roman and the Asolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure, since Titus was so earnest in behaile of those Thessalians, to giue them libertie, though they had stood out against him. euen till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chief cause that moued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alleaged; was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right: For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace, alleaging triuolous matter of their owne suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betwixt the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to whatsoever was demanded, and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side; and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People, by whose soveraigne authority it was concluded, That Peace should be granted vnto the King. So tenne Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had bene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine haue retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Achaens, and all the other Greek Townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Isthmian Games, hee should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greek Townes which he held, and configne them ouer to the Romans: That he should deliuer vp vnto them all Captiues that hee had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of warre, refering to himselfe onely five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatness, wherein fixteene men laboured at euery oare: Further, that he would pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres following, by euery portions. Hereto Liue adds, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents hee had already deliuered to Titus, together with his younger son Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, as such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as yong Demetrius, who together with those four hundred Talents was giuen for hostage, remained still in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias King of Bythynia: giuing him to vnderstand what agreement was made with Philip in behaile of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoyled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bythynian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie, and permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect than of the enemy with whom he had to deale. After this, Enmenes wonne much in Asia, whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand; and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which surname was giuen him, because he sought his prey vpon euery one, without care whether name was giuen him, because he sought his prey vpon euery one, without care whether he were prouoked or not) soared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Hauing fetcht a great compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Ariamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained very louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he loone perceiued; and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length hee resolued to bestow himselfe vpon Ptolemie; his owne conscience telling him, what cuill hee had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good hee was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee layd him vp in close prison: whence, though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, hee fell into the hands of theesues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arfaces founder of the Parthian kingdom: where in his cuill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Arfaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappy reigne of twenty yeres. He had to wife Laodice, the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Captaines: which was father vnto that Atchicus, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as he stiled himselfe) a king, though rather indeed a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice he had two sonnes; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeres in which time he made warre vpon Atalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of body through sicknesse, & in want of money, He could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally hee was slain by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturius a Gaul. His death was reuenged by Achæus, who slue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reigne. Of Ptolemy Euergetes, and Philopator, Kings of Egypt. Warre betweene Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Molo: an Expedition of Antiochus against him. The continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian warre: with the passages betweene the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemie, and Peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his rebellion; his greatnesse, and his fall. Antiochus his Expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fiftene yeres olde, when he began his reigne, which lasted fixe and thirty yeres. In his Minoritie, He was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that hee found in any of the Kings faithfull seruants. This vilde qualitie in a Counsaillour of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe; the successe of things will shortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt so died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere bene remembered. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Achaens: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominions the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the Ptolemies; was giuen to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoiles which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those

those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to haue made war vpon the Arues, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meer couetousnesse of money, refused to pay vnto him his yerely tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Iosephus a  Jew, to whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Celestria, with Palastina & all those parts of the Country tharlay neereft vnto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians; either as hauing fallen to the share of Ptolemie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished & slaine in the battell at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublefome and vnhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucide; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned fixe and twenty yeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtieth and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Sirachides there saith, that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth yere, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty yeres, were the yeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsaillor, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptians; for the recovery of Celestria and the Countries adioyning. This counsaile was very vnseasonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion; and sought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Country. Neuerthelesse Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stidly, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captaines that were faithfull; whilst He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a King. No man durst gainsay the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenetas an Achaen, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebells; whilst in the mean season an Army was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Celestria. The King hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Desert into the Vallie of Maarjæt, betweene the Mountains of Lilbanus and Anti libanum, found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Atolian, that sturued vnder Ptolemie. So hee consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenetas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenetas, whilst hee was yet on his journey, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris; received many aduertisements, by such as fledde ouer vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills, drawne by their Commanders to beare armes against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessity. Xenetas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemie; left in the night time such as hee thought meet to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place tenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenetas could not so be stopped, Hee himselfe dislodged, and tooke his journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether hee did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne souldiours: or whether thereby to deceiue his Enemie; the great folly of Xenetas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenetas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was aduanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authority; without putting him to much trouble of vsing the sword. Wherefore hee suffered his men to feast, with the prouisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather he commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselves against th<sup>e</sup> journey, which he intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fledde. And to the same purpose hee busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went moneths, with promise that hee would bee ready to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as hee would faine haue seemed, but onely to lull his enemies asleepe, whilst he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achaus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would haue vied, He vsed himselfe, as presuming, that when time of the yere better serued, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, since Ptolemy provided not for their defence. Neuerthelesse, hee gaue audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. Hee said, that it was agreed betwene Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemy the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonus, should bee giuen in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates; after the battaile at Issus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said, that Ptolemy the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Celestria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countreies about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemy demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemy would needs haue Achaus comprehended in the League betwene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deale with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seek to ioyne him in Confederacie with his own Soueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemy, with a very puissant Armie, was coming vp against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountered on the way by those Capitaines of Ptolemy, that had resisted him the yere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuerthelesse he draue them: and, proceeding onward in his journey, wonne so many places, that hee greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neere together: many Capitaines of Ptolemy forsooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly the Greekes, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemy, with Arteme his sister and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deeds of his Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to valew themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they beene fewer would haue beaten those of Affrike. Wherefore by the aduantage of those beasts, He draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein he fought himselfe. But Ptolemy had the better men; by whose valour he brake the Groffe of his Enemies battaile, and won the victory; whilst Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field about teenty thousand foot, and sixe thousand horse; wherof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not four hundred horse, yet the fame of his ouerthrow tooke from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemy and Achaus, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Egyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted, it being much against the nature of Ptolemy to vex himselfe thus, with the tedious businesse of warre. So Ptolemy, hauing staid three moneths in Syria, with the tedious businesse of warre, returned home into Egypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subiects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achaus was not comprised in the League betwene these two Kings: or if hee had bene

bee included therein; yet would on the Egyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that hath thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus: Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Mela the Rebell had bene, one of meane regard other wise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin german to the King, as hath bene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemy of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if hee would meddle in that quarrell betwene his sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian: He was not onely slothfull, but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemy, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late Expedition, beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferior to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenary Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subiection. Thus brake out a warre betwene the King and his subiects: wherein though the ill guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemy thereby vailed much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue bene spent, as he thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achaus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achaus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and hide him woike on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had put vp Achaus into the Citie of Sardis; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so sthere appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likely hood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Ligras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Caste it selfe, was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne wall adioyning to the Caste, in that part which was called the Saeve, was in like manner situate vpon deepe Rocks, and almost inaccessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottom, wherein the dead carcases of Horses, and other beasts, veales, and sometimes of men, vied to be throwne. Now it was obscured by Lagoras that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vied to flie vp vnto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch vpon the walls, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, hee reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his iudgement, and gae vnto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprise. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and though with much labour, yet without distance, he scaled those Rocks, and whilst a generall assault was made, entered the Towne in that part; which was at other times vnguarded, thert without thought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardis; when Cleofus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke no warning, by the example of a losse thirty yeres past; and therefore out of memorie, Achaus held still the Caste: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the viall tediousnesse of expectation; his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth vnto them his sister Agathocles, with the yong King in her armes; began a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the childe into the armes of his sister, but vnto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great neede was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to fetter the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spak; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the Assembly: He that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified; thought to goe to worke, as had formerly bene his manner, by vsing his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He hailed out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus, and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumours, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilst they were committed in the old Kings name) to meete in knots together, and vtter one to another their minds, where- in they had conceived extreame hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moued with feare of harme; which, in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For hee was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernement, as afterwards he proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouiision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people: so by the remedy which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vpror. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom hee suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore Souldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparell to be tormented. But whilst the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Moeragenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the doores open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conueighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Janizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus bene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse ado than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenante fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the streetes; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing so them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, scrued well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire, to get what part he could of the chilles estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craved helpe against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant to diuide betwene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan, whose Father had bene Confederate with them both. So M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian, He was very soone found bu-

 10 lled, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Ætolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not finde: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that He was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath 15 bene shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, He subdued the Temes, who 20 seeme to haue yielded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was 25 not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cynosephale; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recovered all that had bene lost. Among the rest, the Temes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were
 30 therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbear to invade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as 35 may seeme, that the Countie would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne
 40 parts of Asia, whilst Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betwene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to afford him great aduan-
 45 tage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellepont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath bene declared, seemed easily to be swallowed vp at once. One
 50 while therefore he tooke what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Temes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yield him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon 55 Attalus his Kingdome, yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadors, and delisted from that enterprise. Hauiug thus farre gratified the 60 Romans, He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a peace & amitie betwene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpassed, that these his Embassadors were louing-
 65 ly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogeth-70 er to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answere of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne in-
 75 tent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be trou-
 80 bled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, notwithstanding much vpon the nice ex-
 85 amination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words 90 for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly
 95 prepares to winne some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee 100 sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit he can off the distractions in 105 Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How 110 notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes, hee offered one of his 115 daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of 120 Pergamus; seeking each of their friendship, at one and the same time, when hee
 125 sought to make each of them a spoyle. Thus was hee acting and deliberating at once; 130 being caried with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies; which is a disease of great, 135 and ouer-swelling fortunes. Howsoeuer it was, He sent an Armie to Sardes by Land, 140 vnder two of his owne sonnes: willing them thence to stay for him; whilst hee himselfe
 145 with a Fleece of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe
 150 along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptian.
 155 It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whilst the warre of Philip lay yet vpon
 160 their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud 165 Embassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond 170 certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any 175 quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because he should not ioyne with Philip their enemy, 180 and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it o-185 therwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and without any

any shew of indignation gave a gentle answer, partly himselfe to their Embassadors, partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appeare to haue beene a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed betweene his Embassadors and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; vntill the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had euer bene greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessitie, gaue what aide they could vnto all the subiects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, betweene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: Hee excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Philetarus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make warre vpon Antiochus; and therefore finally preuaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstaining from this affinity, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbor, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where he tooke such order as he thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampascus to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and obstinately stroue to maintain it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed vnto the Hellepont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed ouer into Europe side, and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Asiatics objected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting therein a Garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his Garrison did not oppress the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such, might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his comming thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countrey therabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequentie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: hee tooke a iourne in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie, leaving the other halfe to repaire the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the conuenient situation, and former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus; and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearly pay: and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Countrey, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: the flight vnto the King Antiochus. The Asiatics murmur against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Achaens, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace sent to Antiochus by the Romans.

Or the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards, passe betwene them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betwene them. This was whilst as yet they were busied with Philip; and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptance: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece were become little better than Climates vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worke, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsaillors sent from Rome, required (as hath been shewed before) with a commination of war, this kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-proffered amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsaillors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vniuersall of the businesse: wherein left T. Quintius, with his ten Assaillants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome on purpose, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betwene him and Ptolemie. What other private instructions Cornelius had; we may coniecture by the manning of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Vellius and L. Terentius, hauing bene sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, he hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsaillors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesanax and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those pe remptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present had expound vnto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betwene him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof hee had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and Hee done nothing? Further He warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iourne there was none probable, than a purpose to make warre vpon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking

upon the matters of Asia: wherewith Hee prayed them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his coming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lyfimachia, and the recovery of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countreie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lyfimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in the controuersie betweene him and the other Kings, had bene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Agyptians; but had bene seized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countreies, were hindred by multiplicitie of businesse, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in feare of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lyfimachia, since it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vpon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Agypt, since it was his meaning to make the free Cities be in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refuse it; would needes heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampfacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampfacus being called in, beganne to tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace; forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the warre by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greekes, pretend onely the goodnesse of their swords; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of 30 their iustice, forbore the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious ghostes; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Agypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdom; and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and let the Countreie in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, and prepare for his Agyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the King fourth with made ready, to be in Agypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to ouer-see the building of Lyfimachia: but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence hee sent Embassadors to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort, as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as hee was further proceeding on his voyage, He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aliue. This made him beare another way from Agypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grieuous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatie at Lyfimachia, (at least 50 wile not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had bene sent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should be bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who deale thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were solicited; and particularly the Aetolians. That

That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to haue well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had bene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had bene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vpbaying withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their Victory ouer Philip; but euen for helping them to let foote in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Here to the Roman gaue gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their grieues; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thanks of the Roman Senate; and to chase out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen the man overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the lues, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they vse this: their power with moderation; but conspired in such wise together, 30 that who so offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies; which being once known; He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Citie, Hannibal was chosen Praetor. By vertue of which Office, though he was superior vnto them during that yeere; yet had it not bene: their manner to beare much regard vnto such an annuall Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must be accountable to them, if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore tending for one of the Questors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Questor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For hee was of the aduersie Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Iudges: in contemplation wherof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greatnesse. But hee 30 had not to doe with such a true Praetor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Persuuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into iudgement before a publike assembly of the people. There hee not onely shewed, what the vndutifull stubbornnesse of this Questor had bene; but how vnsufferable the insolencie of all the Iudges at the present was: whose vnbidded power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had bene passed, before hee passed ouer Iberus: it would not per- 40 haps haue bene in the power of Hanno, to haue brought him vnto necessitie of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leue by Taxation layed vpon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting money in their publike Treasurie, wherewith to defray either that, or diuers other needefull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publike Reuenues; and to take a perfect nore, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes whatsoeuer; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So hee found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not thence the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vse, were thereby faine to loade the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof hee 50 made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasurie were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts; as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once; euen when they thought themselves to haue bene in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly bein armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasure, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to allege, than their owne inuentions: they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beast, which would neuer be tamed: That secret messages past betwene him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complaine of idleness, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, euery one to 10 the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their maleious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witness against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vied their Victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such aduantage against Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadors they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Seruilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius 20 Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their comming; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controversies, betwene the Carthaginians and Masaniissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall vpon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by slight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when he began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed 30 Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had he a Shippe furnished with all things needefull; as hauing long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So Hee bade Africk farewell, lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Cercina, hee found there in the Haven some Merchants shippes of Carthage. They saluted him respectfully: and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whither he was bound. Hee said, Hee went Embassador to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iland to make a sacrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore He would 40 needes hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted couert, Hee made them bring thither all their failles and yards to be vsed in stead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleepe; and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador: neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speede homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diuersly construed. Some ghesed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where 50 he had bene scene: and then the Roman Embassadors, hauing none other errand thither, accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they only discouered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; mistaking the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderstand, that He fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal comming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrans, by reason of affinity betwene their Cities, thought themselves to haue interest. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his sonne in Daphne: who friendly welcomed med him, and sent him vnto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly reioyced at his comming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie, otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrey. For it would not proue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout Souldiours of base Asiatiques; as it had been by his trayning and discipline, to make very seruiceable and skillfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardie, though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of cowardly people: yet was it there-withall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man; than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions where-in he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victorie: or if it further serued to hearken Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to auoid the war, then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that hee had any meaning to take Armes; vntill he by mere violence he were thereto enforced. Onely the Atolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them, they had of late bene answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsaillours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and vnaduised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to 30 right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romanes out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrey. For the Atolians were wont to vbraide the rest of the Greeks with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliuerers had layd heavier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greekes their chaine, and tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romanes had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip made no delay in accomplishment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrey at 40 peace, both with the Romanes, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus; Hee made it his daily suit, That the Peace betwene him and Rome, such as it was, might bee confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuertheless T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armee were thence departed. And in this regard, Hee retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, hee might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Sureable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the tenne Embassadors, that had bene sent ouer to assitt him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlesse fall vpon Greece: wherein he should find not only the Atolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon, readie to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilst Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intentiue to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be readie to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his

Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarrance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be forry; though for his owne part, hee wanted all good presence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is already shewed, whilst he had warre with Philip: and had further bene contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achaens; neither since that time had hee done any thing, whereby he should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achaens; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischiefe. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not only the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which hee there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which hee now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than only the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the noble City of Argos was left in subiection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duely to consider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to be vndertaken; or whether to otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselves. The Athenian Embassador made answer herunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as hee could deuise. Hee gaue thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their virtues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pitty it was to heare, such notable vertue & high deserts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imagination to foretell, what harme the City Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would haue required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Atolians. Wherefore Alexander the Atolian rose vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their City had bene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty generall: from which honor they were now so farre fallen, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would leade all the rest into seruitude. Then spake He against the Achaens, Clients that had bene a long time vnto the Macedonian; and foulders of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, He said, had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre bee made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Atolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwaies bene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; hauing bene alwaies wont to proteste, That Greece could neuer be at libertie, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesse wherewith to finde themselves occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But so they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Atolians themselves did promise, & would vndertake, That they would either cause him to yield to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had bene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Atolians; as did their owne raucous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselves, that worke would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had bene couenanted, That the Romans should enioy the spoyle of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Atolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole assembly, especially the Achaens, crie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Atolian theues bee enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Atolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. He cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsaillours which had bene sent vnto him from Rome, to bee his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedamonian warre; it was very soone ended. For Titus vsed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if hee should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Romane forces, King Eumenes with a Naue, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the seruice: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get fauor of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaens, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Atolians: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achaens now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remooued the Atolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedamonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argiues more bold then wise, began a conspiracie against the Lacedamonians that held their Towne, meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and flaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Arme to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no fit within the Walles: the execution done vpon the first mouers, hauing terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedamon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the Warre was made, pitty it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readinesse an Army of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrey; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumised slaues, malefactors and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Assembly: and compassing them round in with his Arme, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves, they might, hee said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and the mildest course, to arrest beforehand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preferre not only the City and his owne person from danger, but them also for the punishment, which else they might haue incurred. Heereupon hee cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom hee leades away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was hee sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noyed abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby vnderstand, that it was a mortall crime to bee suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe vnto some some poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and slaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a fallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ran the Countrey, hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleete at the same time with King Eumenes and the Rhadians, layd siege vnto Gythium, the onely or principall Towne that Nabis had. Like-ly they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouernours within the Towne equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor, after whose death, hee himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gythium: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment with a thousand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thousand Argiues: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gythium: which hee thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke vpon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Titus: requesting onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parleue the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments, whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could object vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon hee inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alledged, they ought to make warre vpon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from 39 entering into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with Tyrannie, and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alledged. Wherefore hee said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That hee had bargained to ioyne with Philip; when he was their enemie, not onely in League, but also in affinity: and that his Fleete had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom hee had long held warre: it may seeme to haue bene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very troublesome. As for Messene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to haue bene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristanus, the Prator of the Achaens, verie well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed this discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis 40 to consider well of his own estate, and to settle his fortunes, whilest he might do it without hazzard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happinesse, as priuate men. Thus they discoursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in League all that that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending, Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grieuous. Hee would not suffer the Lacedaemonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor warre, either in that Iland or elsewhere; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barks; besides many other troublesome iniunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be paid out of hand, and fittie talents ycerely, for eight 10 yeeres next ensuing. For obseruance of these Couenants hee demanded fve hostages, such as hee himselfe should name; and one of them to bee the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had bene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon iustice: then had it bene enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which hee himselfe did offer, though it were for feare; to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, haue bene prosecuted vnto the very vtmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to entich themselves by the spoyle 10 of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Achaens, who iudged it euer after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister vnto the Asiatians, and such as curiously pried into the faults of those which rooke vpon them, to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Mattered Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors; it was thought very strange, that Lacedaemon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yesterday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe vnmercifully dealt withall, by the selfe-same 39 Romans, whose amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But fastly had hee dealt with the Macedonian: and fastly was hee dealt with by those, to whom hee did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; saue onely that for the banished Lacedaemonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; hauing among them Agessipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a yong childe was driuen out by Lycurgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to haue them restored vnto their Citie and Estates; but onely leaue required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to liue abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore hee forbore to giue consent vnto these demands: 40 and sustained an assault or two, hoping belike that the enemies would soone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these iniuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had bene propounded, Hee deliuered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans farre more wicked than himselfe; and was readie vpon the first aduantage, to doe them all the mischief that he could.

The Argiues had heard newes that Lacedaemon was euen at point of being taken. This crested them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to set vpon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remouee of the three 10 thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should let their hands to the getting of it; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was ioyfullie welcommed. Hee was deferuently acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laied hold without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himselfe thereto, hee caused the libertie of the Argiues to be proclaimed at the Newman games, as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Commonweale of Achaia; whereby the Achaens were not more strengthened, than the Argiues themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little businesse or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace & friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed vnto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vsincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Atolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Atolians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countie, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leauing the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; hee called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There hee recounted vnto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts, and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romanes found, and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell, touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achaens; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrius; that so it might bee knowne, what lies the Atolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. Withioyfull acclamations did the Greekes testify their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ranome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin sold into their Countie by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with a happy end: and by leauing the Countie before his departure was vged, lest therein behinde him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by ielouie & suspicion of any euill meaning. At his coming to the Citie, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoyles of a Countie, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romanes had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: some in the rude Masse vnwrought, some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundry Kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Silver, and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteene Crowns of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this Triumph; He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counsaillors; because their businesse was said to be somewhat intricate. Herat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said vnto Titus & his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either between the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that hauing warred together, were vpon equal termes of aduantage; or between those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently enquire the imposition of some Couenants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had beene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsual to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But betweene those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neither carry it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in precribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kinde, was the league & friendship that had beene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romanes. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia hee should see at libertie, from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes, eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, That since they went so distinctly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore hee propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choice whether to accept; Eyther that it should bee lawfull for the Romanes, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would haue them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandou whatsoeuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romanes might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampascus, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make warre with a King that sought their loue, and had neuer done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lysimachia, whercon of late he had bene at so much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopleing it with inhabitants, that had all beene disperfed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alledged: saying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romanes; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to set at libertie those Towns, which the King would oppresse and hold in subjection: especially since those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had afforded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon haue left Antiochus King of not many subiects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbear to say, That, vnlesse hee would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might bee vnderstood) with such as were his subiects. Wherefore they vged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make; little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Villius, and others that had beene already with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might recieue a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans all that while no disposition to let him liue in peace.

§. V.

Of the long warres which the Romanes had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Iniuries done by Masinissa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romanes for iustice in vaine.

THE Insubrians, Boians, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians, made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselves were viterly subdued: which was not, before the Romanes were almost at the vey height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes,

Ch. 3. 5. 2. of this booke.

Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first preuailed, and got large possitions in Gallia Cisalpine now called Lumbarde, it hath bene long since rehearsed, betwene the first and second Punicke Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage thre-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would haue bene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not beene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwaies made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of bodie; 10 well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor besieged. They were also very poore, and had little or nothing that might giue contentment vnto a victorious Arme that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiers to hardnesse and military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gauls, 20 their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoyling the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, seems to haue bin grounded vpon the Condemnation of all Saluages: To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement; and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vsing their aduantage, or taking reuenge of iniuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betwene them and any of their neighbours, doe v commonly this answer, It hath still bene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against 30 the other.

Diuers ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their owne Countrie they did little harme: not sending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make warre, saue on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Prouinces, which was wholly & thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Ox- 40 hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Ox-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardy Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Capitaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being diuided into many small Signiorities, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer provided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto 50 their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had vnted themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their oftentaking armes.

The Carthaginians had bene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Chollericke Spanish humour; by employing as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vnquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and vled them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits 5 which

which they rayed vpon the whole Countrie; as being farre better husbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwise the Romanes, vsing the seruice of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much businesse with them. Spaine was too far distant, and withal too great, for them to send ouer Colonies thither, where-by to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwaies maintaine such Armies in the Countrie, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Capitaines, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and to thereby held the Countrie; though seldome in peace.

Very soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans, euen vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romanes against the Carthaginians, basely forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with fibicion, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which lasted five yeeres. This Victory of the Romanes, though 10 it happily ended the Warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the Warre, which after five yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconsul, whom they slew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romanes thinke it enough to send thither to Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the yere following, and sent into that Prouince, found at his coming little lesse to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great victory vpon the chieftest of 30 them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrie, and put him vnto much new trouble. Whilst he was about to make a iourne against those that were as yet vnsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were euen ready to rebell. Hee therefore disarmed them: which they tooke so heauily, that many of them slew themselves for very griefe. Hearing of this, and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietnesse, which they neuer had disturbed but vnto their owne great losse; He prayed them to deuise what course might be taken, for holding them assured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counsaile in a matter of this nature. Hauing therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding 40 their inuention barren in this kinde of Subiect; Hee gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Arme of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countreimen: excusing the indignitie, such as it seemed, with a iust. That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should hee neede to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, hee could pay them with the Enemies money. Finally, He brought the Warre to so good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by 50 causing some Mines of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Heerein hee did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vsfull qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skillfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, & not vnprofitable in any businesse either private or publike. Many books he wrote; whereof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance, being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sinceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he were neuer out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that euen vnto the end of his life, He was exerceiled in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore & fixe yeeres, He pleaded in his owne defence: and four yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So beganne the Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grandchilde M. Cato the Vnicus: one, that being of like vertue and seruencie, had all his good purposes dashed, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greariness as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Romane Priets therefore, of which two euery yeere 20 were sent ouer Commanders into Spain (that was diuided into Gouvernements) did rarely faile of such worke; as might afford the honour of Triumph. One slew thirtie thousand Spaniards in a battell: another tooke fiftie Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrie to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof I haue already pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the blisfinesse in Spain required not the employment of a Romane Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed; vntill the Numantian Warre broke out, which was verie long after.

In all other Countreies to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselves & their obedient Citie: Masaniissa fell to disposing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the lesser Syris: wherein among other Cities was that of Lepis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrie the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great aduantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Iudges had been vnpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds had left them the possession of this Country: Masaniissa himselfe, now very lately, pursuing a Rebelle that fled out of his Kingdom, desired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise bene questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniissa had wherewith to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Romane Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately bene sent vnto them from 50 Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had exanited vpon some suspition of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his shippe, had thereby afforded him means to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebelle; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Countrie of Emporia: it had alwaies, hee said, bene theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leaue there to build vpon so much ground; as they could encompass with an Ox-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoeuer they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masaniissa requested of the Senate, That they would not adudge vnto such vipers, the Countrie sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans hauing heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter to doubtfull, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly; they sent ouer three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the 10 African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuersie: yet secretly giuing them instructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masaniissa with a strong Army should quickly preuaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from stirring in fauour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leisure to expresse the utmost of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Aetolians labour to prouoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to warre vpon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis beseegeth Cythereum and wasteth some part of Achaia. The exact skill of Philopemen, in aduantage of ground: whereby hee utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans, ioyne with the Aetolians. The Aetolians surprize Demetrius, and by killing Nabis, their Confederates, seize vpon Sparta. But they are driuen out by the Citizens: who at Philopemen his perswasions annexe themselves to the Achaens.

WHEN L. L. Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved 30 much the Aetolians to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselves the whole spoyle of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes, were not onely disappointed of their couetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vtregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had bene taken from the Macedonian. This might haue well sufficed them, if their desires had not bene immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly dilectemmed, wherein they thought that they had vn- 40 ferable wrong. Wherefore they deuided, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what means they best might right themselves; and giue the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference, betwene their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, to ioyne al together in a new Confederacy: whose ioynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre surmount those of the Romans, Achaens 50 Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Aetolians tooke in hand; and well becoming them, for they were great leaders. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with perswasions, as they thought, most forcible. But Philip was irrefolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedemonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward; and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay siege vnto Cythereum, that had bene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achaens, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his dutie: neither would they haue staied long from repressing his violence by open Warre; had not some of them thought it wisdome to aske counsaile of the Romanes, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilst thus they spent time in sending Embassadors, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the coming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iust cause of complaint, by waisting their owne Territorie.

Philopamen was then Prætor of the Achaens, who had long been absent in Crete, making war there for his mindes sake and recreation. Vnto him the Achaens referred themselves, giuing him leave to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying till the Romanes came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haste to relieue Gythium, by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Achaen Garrison within it, should be lost, if he vied any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong to Ship from a rotten. Hee made a Quadireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yecres agoe bene counted a gallant vessel, in the Nauie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Flecte so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedemonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was steepped at the first, and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Flecte saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and faced themselves with what speed they could. But Philopamen was not herewith daunted. If so hee had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gythium, to stoppe the Achaens if they should invade his Countie. But vpon their which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came unexpected; fired their Camp; and put all, save a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched hee with all his Armie towards Lacedamon: within ten mil: whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gythium. It was not expected that Nabis would haue bene ready for them so soone. Or if hee should come from Gythium, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some five miles; hauing their 30 Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to make the situation of the Countie about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same. He would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and forted in such manner, and marching towards such a place, he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were meet for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand: what peece of ground it 40 were meet for him to seize vpon? and in what manner he might best do it? in what fort he should order his men: where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard: in what fort encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continual meditation, Hee was growne so perfect, that hee did neuer meet with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, Hee encamped nere vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, withall thereto belonging, hee flowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke, whereto the Acha- 50 ens lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place coniuient; wherinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, hee caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitiue; and tell him, that the Achaens had a purpose to get betwene him and Lacedamon; whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recouery of their freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue bene forced.

Some

Some Companies he made to stay behinde, and shew themselves vpon the Ramparts, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopamen was not to be beguiled. He easily wonne the Campe, and gaue chase to Nabis: whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in covert all that day; Philopamen conceiued aright, that their feare and necessity would teach them to creepe homewards, and save themselves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the Euenings, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilst it was day, He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves; and occupied the two most ordinary passages vnto Lacedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiving in Philopamen 10 Campe great force of lights; thought that all had bene at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie dayes together after this, did Philopamen waste the Countrey round about, whilst Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their parrie strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Asiatians. Very faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoeuer hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receiue other fauours at their hands; and regain possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilst their Embassadors that were with him in Asia, denied o- 20 therwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where hee had accomplished the marriage betwene Ptolemie and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings sonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadors; cut- 30 ted them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answer as at their leaving forth. One thing that might haue bene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to pass during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Titie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a uselesse suspicion wherein he held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, Hannibal iudged the 40 most worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrhus the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldst thou haue said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue given the first place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King: and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recouered his former grace, and credit. For hee told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he neuer should be friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine surmises: but to know thus much, That so long as hee thought vpon warre with 50 Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good service: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behooue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Aetolians, and their friends, were no lesse busie all this while, in making their parrie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering vp their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vinting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victory against Philip; that finally they pre- 60 uailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, vnlesse he would buy it at a deare rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vaine. He vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their owne forces to the uttermost: as knowing, that all the burden must lie vpon Antiochus and himselfe, without helpe from any; since onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. While it they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclusorally, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the businesse worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panatholium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appeale them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne field, on which, to the ruine of the Countrey, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Libertie: the Atolians, as Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becoming the Sticklers. As for those grieuances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired: than thus to set the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skiled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to haue those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtaine what they desired, either as their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such termes had they beene feasted once already: and were by the Senate reiectied vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado, they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to set the Countrey at libertie, as also to decide the controuersies depending betweene the Romans and Atolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it; they forgot no point of brauery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and aginst the Romans. Titus desired of their Prator, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prator answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if hee came to their campe in Italy vpon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better, as the Atolians are like to vnderstand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more priuate Councell of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authoritie of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Atolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden; entring, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words aginst T. Quintius, had bene driuen to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loued him, againe recalled. His Atolian companions, that were so not many, seized vpon a Gate; whereas they let in a Troupe which they had left not farr behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Towne prepared to defend it selfe aginst them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more insolently dominated ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetoricke they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plain force.

force. For the Townesmen replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this businesse was dashed. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne, styling himselfe King; but more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had well-nere lost all by means of the ouertrow which Philip had lately giuen him; since, he durst not stirre abroad; and daily expected the mischance, that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after another, to the Atolians; requesting them, That as he had bene slow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduertured himselfe vpon the vnmort of danger, when all others were backward, so they would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to neede it. It hath bene often said, That the rauenous Atolians were onely true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenarie forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and by so doing, to assure Lacedamon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirte Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirte were by Damocritus the Prator brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make waite with the Acheans, or to doe ought else, save onely what Alexamenus should command them; which, were it neuer so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they vnderstand, that vlesse they performed it, they should haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the Atolians, He said, that if neede should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedamon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater companie. Hee cupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bene long pend vp in the Citie; and traine them without the walls: as if shortly he should employ them in worke of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside aloneto his Atolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great worke that he had in hand: He then went aside to his thirte Horsemen, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their setting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vlesse they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should fee him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and strucke him downe. The thirte Atolians neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any secour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ranne vnto the dead body: where in stead of seeking reuenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Atolians hastied into the Citie, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had bene brought vp with Nabis his children, whom they mounted vpon a good Horse, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell vpon the Atolians that were idly stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with with not many of his Company, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtful Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopæmen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexæmenes should haue done after he had slaine the Tyrant, easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themselves with the Acheans. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians, and the small, but effectfull, traualle of Philopæmen, the Acheans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin gouerned either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, whereof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages betwene him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians and others. Hewins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubœa. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the Citill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Acheans. That is concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betwene the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Eiathes that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanitie, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and rauels away the rest of winter. Vpon the coming of the Roman Consul all for sake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Streights of Thermopyla. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece vnto the Victors.

Antiochus was troubled much in Asie with Smyrna and Lampſacæ, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behinde him; and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he desirous with all speede conuenient to leue himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore hardie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was already vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were ready to conſpire vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africke, there to molest the Romans, and so giue him the better leisure of vſing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came ouer to him, and bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Countreymen had already taken Demetrius; a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceede as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without neede of vſing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vnſit man to be employed in the Kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feeble the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal preuailed; Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should bealwayes neere vnto the Kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the ſoueraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being iealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon. Presently

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a ſtutious pompe of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Ithum there to doe sacrifice to Minerva of Trôys. Thence passing ouer the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrius. Eurylochus the Magnettian, the same whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrius; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreymen, in great ſrequentie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a ſigne of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be ſuſpected, that the Magnettians found not the like cause of ioy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie ſomewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ſhips; of which, no more than fortie were ſerueiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horſe, and ſixe Elephants. The Ætolians no ſooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Conncell, He made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excuſed, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he said, in true estimation a ſigne of his good will: in that he ſtaid not to make all things ready, but haſted vnto their aid, euen whilest the ſeaſon was vnſit for nauigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be ſatiſfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coaſt with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, traualle, or danger, to follow the buſineſſe which he had undertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leaving the Countrey free indeede, and the Ætolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all prouiſions to them belonging should be correspondent; becauſe hee would not be any way burdenſome vnto his Confederates. But at the preſent he muſt needs entreat them, hauing thus haſtily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprouiſed of many neceſſaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he ſtood in neede. So he left them to their conſultation: the conſclusion whereof was, after a little diſpute, (for a vaine motion was made by ſome, that the differences betwene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromiſe to the decion of Antiochus) That they would yeelde vnto the Kings desire, and aſſiſt him with all their forces. Here we may obſerue, how vaine a thing it is for an abſolute Prince to engage himſelfe, as did Antiochus in a buſineſſe of dangerous importance, vpon the promiſed aſſurance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and ſome other of that Faction, had not preuailed in this Conncell: the Ætolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of ſuch gaine that might haue deceiued them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the diſcretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there beene, if this had ſo fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himſelfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he muſt haue beene contented with this anſwer, That the fault was in thoſe of the oppoſite ſide; whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the preſent; though in the future it proued much worſe, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was choſen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commiſſioners were appointed to be about him, as a Conncell of Warre for the Nation. Theſe armed ſuch as readily they could, whilest it was in diſpute where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meeteſt place to be firſt undertaken: whether it they came ſuddenly, they ſhould not peraduenture neede to vſe much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thouſand Foot, leaving the reſt behinde him at Demetrius. With theſe he haſted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Ætolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magiſtrates, and ſome of the chiefe Citizens, iſſued forth to paſſe with him. There the Ætolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and falſe ſemblance, ſet Greece at libertie. But ſuch libertie, as might be true and vſefull, they ſaid would neuer be obtained; vntill by remouing the neceſſitie of obeying their pleaſure that were moſt mightie, euery ſeueral Estate had where to finde redreſſe of any preſſure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheless desired them only, so to ioyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans and Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute, was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lanes, and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But since hee, and the Atolians, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Atolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeelde: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten; all the rest of the Island shortly yielded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer-late to haue defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Bootia, lying ouer against the Island; where was a Temple and Groue, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the privilege of an inuiolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilst others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Atenippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himselfe in many vaine Treaties of peace, tooke aduantage of their carelesse, and vied them with all extremity of warre. Very few of them escaped: fiftie were taken; and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintus was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more iust cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece, in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wisest fort returned such answer, as the Calcidians had done. Some reserved themselves, whilst he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He must hold them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if he came, the Romans must pardon their iust feare, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, ioynd with him in true meaning; save the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Atolians, and now feared the Achaens. Little reason there was, that he should thinke to draw the Achaens to his partie. Neuertheless he assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was said to beare vnto Philopemens vertue, had bred a secret dislike betwene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Atolians sent Embassadors to the Councill at Agium; that spared not braue words, if the Achaens would haue bene so taken. The Kings Embassadors told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming, reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimians, and Cadusians; names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydians, Tyrians, Arabians, and Pamphylians were; such indeede as could not be resisted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much decieued: who considering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue like the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmost parts of the East, requested no more of the Achaens, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilst He tooke order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Atolian Embassador, and further added, That in the battell at Cynosephala, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: for that both He and his Armie had bene there destroyed, had they not bene protected by vertue of the Atolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councill, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could haue bene desired. He told the Achaens, That neither the Kings Embassadors, nor the Atolians, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanitie was, that had thus lincked the King and the Atolians together. For euen such bragges is here they made before the Achaens who knew them to be lyars, had the Atolians also made vnto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory ouer Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Countrey of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they bene fastned by the King, with such tales as his Embassadors told euen now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimians, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaves, and good for little else. These diuers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diuersitie of Venison, where with a friend of his at Chalcis (no such vanter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, whereat he wondred, was none other, as his Host then merrily tolde him; than for many pieces of one tame swine, dressed after severall fashions with varietie of sauces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make iudgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Armie hee was faine in a manner, to begge victuals of the Atolians; and take vp money at vsurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne vp and downe the Countrey, from Demetrias to Lamia, thence backe to Chalcis, and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lyes: where with since both Antiochus and the Atolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men tooke heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditory much perforsion is needlesse. The Achaens did not loue so well the Atolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the worst subjects. Wherefore they stood not to harken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed warre against him, and against the Atolians.

How the hatred betwene these two Nations grew inveterate; sufficiently appeares in the storie foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons: the one, the Romans, the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them wisely: though tarr the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Atolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrey at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue bene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue fought, not how Smyrna and Lampiscus might recover their liberty (which had neuer bene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countrey, as two Seas by an Isthmus or necke of land, might be kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiaticques, which originally were Greekeish; than the general applauses, where with all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take arms euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell bene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countrey, had bene farre from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achaens were at this time, in a manner, the onely Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gaue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessolians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor showed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Baotians willingly receiued him, as soone as he entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans by whom they had bene somewhat hardly vied. Aminander the Arbamanian, besides his old friendship with the Atolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himselfe to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Abthamania: where hauing made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was iudged by Antiochus and the Ætoli-ans, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto good title as he. But for the enabling of them herunto; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by persuasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subiects; or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynosephale, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended merely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them: wherein they should be pleased to vse him.

The Ætoli-ans, Magnetians, Eubæans, Boians, and Abthamanians, hauing now all ioy- nend with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his persuasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge, as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long bene cast aside, as a vessel of no vse; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now vter, was euen the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before bene asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Boians, and other their good friends, which now for willingly tooke their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same feare for their excuse? Wherefore he thought most behooufull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to reuocall and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had meane to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though indeede what neede was there, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said Hee, Thessalie is the present; and namely, this Thoes, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motiues which he then used to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly insulence of the Romans: likening that King to some wilde beast, that was chained or locked up within some grate, and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomacke, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoue vs to looke vnto him; that he may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne Seleucus is now at Egymachia, with part of your Armie: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassadour, let Seleucus be in readinesse, to fall vpon Macedon, and send him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip; and the present warre in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein now you are embarked against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: Whereunto had you then giuen ear, he Romans by this time should haue heard other newes, than that Chalcis in Eubæa was become ours. Italie & Gaulle should haue been on fire with warre; and little little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet & Armie hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many moulthes.) Wherefore let the one halfe be employed against Italie; whilst you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen ready to follow vs into Italie: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice; who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of warre, yet how to war with the Romans, I haue been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile youer you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; save onely that those was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessalie; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprietor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemy vnto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more: than the succour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountaines toppes as farre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had bene comming vpon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yce; He brake vp his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as hee could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiours as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise that when heooke the field, he might euidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this loose fence of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus tell to him by lot; whereas otherwise Hee was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of far lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and distrust, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Boians; wherein hee purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, & fiftie thousand Elephants. Ptolemie King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and siluer, toward the detraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his money was returned vnto him with thanks; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philip Embassadours answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that Hee should giue to Acilius the Consul.

Consul. Massissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did sturue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And here in Massissa farre out-went the poore Citie of Carthage; as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertooke to set out a Fleet at their owne charges; and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-mony, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerly pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it. 10

The hastie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betwene the Roman and the Astiatick Souldior. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as he had preuailed in other parts of Greece, partly by fire works, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe forsake him. But King Philip and Babius, having reconer'd many places; and the Romans Conful being arriv'd, against whom none made resistance; Hee was glad to withdraw himselfe. Antinander fled out of this Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Antinander's wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking stocke, and sent a-20 way prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue up themselves: the Garrison of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stay'd behinde, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawne himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of neede, Hee found all the promises of the Aetolians merely verball: and himselfe reduced into tearmes of great extremite. He therefore admir'd Hannibal 30 as a wise man, yea a very Prophet, that had fore-seene all this long before. Neuertheless: He sent word to the Aetolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their owne neede to be no lesse than his. But the Aetolians had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who hauing promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, then that Thousas and his fellows had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take armes. Since 40 therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: Hee seized vpon the Streights of Thermopylae; as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopylae there hath bene spoken enough * before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceiued, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece, vntill they could winne this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betwene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handful of men, defended this passage two or three dayes together, against a World of men comming to invade the Countrey. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great intricacies, and effect what he list'd himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe vnto the safetie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than hee had in his owne Armie. There whilst he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Aetolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus; but at leastwise now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come downe vpon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the the Streights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sicknesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them bene Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Aetolians. He himselfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what safe condition enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifullly reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a fore journey (for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, saue onely that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skillfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepie Rocks and crooked wayes; He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst Hee, being a very able man of body, tooke in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeede it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men, and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylae bene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any traualers to search out the passages of these desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead 20 him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which hee discouered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Aetolians very neere vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lustie Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that seruice; and wiled them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and hee thereby vnderstood, that these Aetolians were no more than fixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So hee presently set vpon the Aetolians; ouerthrew them; slue a great part of them; and chased the rest, that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was already begun betwene the Armies below; and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and druen them into their Campe, found 30 it in a manner a desperate peece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill-side, and powred downe a shoure of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Aetolians had bene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Romane armes and ensignes were discouered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Romane Army from making pursuit. Yet this dayes losse drave Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence 40 with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Aetolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that hauing recovered health, came to ioine with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victory was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Aetolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea, and Philip, Lamia, 50 at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who saue would haue gotten Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vied to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to betaken, when the Consul, hauing won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoyle of these Towns was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylae. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could foill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was ready to cuse him of his charge.

The losse of Heracles did so affright the Asiatians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece, or if any thing withheld him from continuing impetion, at leastwise to helpe them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour, but appertained vnto his owne safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Asiatians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backs, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of the warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Thibias, another of their Embassadors, Hee retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might vrge the King to make his word good. But when Heracles was taken from them, then did the Asiatians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suite vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said He had other businesse in hand; onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent Le Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their coming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alledge how well they had deluered of the Ro-mans. Wherevnto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euery times, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith, signified, in their vse of it, little else, than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense, and counted them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was; and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said Hee, I commend you first of all, That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse priuate or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicaearchus the Asiatian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countreimen as haue followed him in reuoluing from vs. Whilst he was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who had yielded themselves vnto his faith; nor vnto slavery. What? (said the Consul) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euery one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apoletian ordinarie Councell of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions, without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause He entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This successfull of warre, during ten and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heracles; when Philip had bene commanded away from Lamia, that he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Armie, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further neede of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilst the Consul was busied with the Asiatians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamanians, Perthabians, Aperantians, and Dolopians. For the Asiatians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that that Nicanor about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with money and hopeful promises: the Romans abiding still about Heracles; and Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being farre gone thence. His monie Nicanor conueighed into Lamia, by very vnusuall快捷. But he himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Asiatians, there to make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his iourney, which lay betwene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as farre as they could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians, by whom he was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but either to be deliuered vnto the Romans, or vied ill enough by Philip. But it seemed, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For He commanded his seruants to entreat Nicanor friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose vp: giuing him to vnderstand; That the Asiatians did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse, forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselves contented, but would needes be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus; but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, on vnto the other, would be much more available vnto each of them; than their mutual catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicanor to signifie vnto his Countreimen; and priuately to hold in minde the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata; He louingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicanor was alwaies after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the war of Perseus he made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Asiatians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: hee forthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Nauropactus; whither hee therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Nauropactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceiued it: for it was a strong Citie, and well manned. But Acilius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should haue bene a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So He staid there: welneere all the following time of his Consulship; whilst the Macedonian King and the Acheans made farre better vse of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had reuolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Acheans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long bene addicted to the Asiatian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other helpe when the Achean Prætor wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeelde. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annexe themselves vnto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Miestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Acheans; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euen termes: it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once bene Philips, and was after ward giuen by him to Aminander who sent a Governour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driven out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Ile to the Acheans; whom hee found ready Chappmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their

their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Achaens referred themselves vnto his discretion. So hee told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tortoyse, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell: and that holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they and that holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger, but if they went needs bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having seled things thus in Peloponnesus, hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had laine two moneths, that might haue bene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which hee had vpon the Asiatians, or out of dislike of King Philip thriving so fast: He perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves, craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Asiatians haue made such earnest suit as they did. vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had bene sure to carrie it, in any short space: it may well be thought hee would not haue gone away without it; since the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would haue made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came vnto Rome, no creature could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two: That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than the Romans should giue approbation. They had not so much money: neither could they wel so hope to bee gently dealt withall, if they should giue themselves away vnto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnderstood. Wherefore they desired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeeld vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilst the Asiatians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consull had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to set things in order among the tractable Achaens. Hee would haue had them to restore the banished Lacedamonians home into their Countrey; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Common-wealth. This the Achaens liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedamonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne mere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Achaens: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted, and saw that they should haue their desire, without such compulsiue mediation.

The Romane Admirall C. Linius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and fise and twenty saile of Rhadians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of faile: 40 but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betooke himselfe to a speedie retreat.

And such end had the first yeeres warre, betwene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Asiatians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare, thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now send to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his younger sonne; whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which 50 he regarded hee desired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, wherein soeuer it pleased them to vse it, should not be wanting. This Ptolemy was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of Fortune. He vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent The beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The same did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himselfe a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had bin in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Asia into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, and make him try the chance of a battell for his Kingdome. §. VIII.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, hauing with him Publius the African his elder brother; for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Asiatians, that so bee might as lesseure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea; and diuers fights. An invasion vpon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamus, rayged by an handfull of the Achaens. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it: The battaile of Magnesia; wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victorie. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph ouer Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stiled The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lelius. Lelius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore bearing desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Prouinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more 20 desirous to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied vpon Hannibal, & should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had bene victorious against that same Great Worthy? But indeed a worse man might haue serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had an absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation; where his wisdom was much approved, but his libertie and high spirit as 30 much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a signe of the freedom that he vsed in his censures, even whilst hee liued in such a Court. Antiochus mistruied his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him wish, that he had bene serued by such braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans; the most couetous men in all the world: meaning, that all this Cost vpon the backs of Cow- 40 ardly Asiatiques, was no better than a spoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King, it is easie to guess. The little vse that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the vse of his seruice, when he stood in greatest need thereof.

The Scipios made all haffe away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the warre, about fise thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Amilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphyssa a Citie of the Asiatians. The Asiatians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore 50 they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vnregarded the last yeere. Glabrio knowing this, deceiued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden, was carried at the second assault. Thence went He to Amphyssa: which he had almost gotten, when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot, and fise hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphyssa was presently forsaken by the inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; wherinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Asiatians:

the Overthrow newly mentioned, which caused Seleucus to give over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, foure or five Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could, doe to Apollonius; and hauing the victory taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not farre adventure vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Praefaces vnto the warre; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battaile was fought by Myonesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him foure score and nine Gallies; and five of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vnted the last yeere. That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodian more light-timbered and thin planked, hauing all advantage of speede, and good Sea-men. Neither forbore they to helpe themselves by the same deuice; with which, five of their Gallies had gottey to helpe the Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy: who lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being hemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysted saile: and hauing a faire winde, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet some of their Gallies they left behinde them: wherof thirteene were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three shippes: but got hereby the absolute Maisterie of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had beene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: He presently withdrew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue beene kept, euentill the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers (if the sieges had bene continued obstinately) vnto termes of great extremitie. Hee also gaue order the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought save onely of defence, drew together all his Armie, and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Antiochus rather the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellepont, but had yielded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readinesse, to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that hee landed quietly at his owne good ease; euen as if the Countrey had bene his already. The first newes that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Embassador that came to sue for peace. This Embassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampascus, and Lysimachia, had bene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now alreadye giuen out Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to friue with the Romans about Lampascus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should bee also set at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, diuiding them from the King, might not be vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their hands. It all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges; wherewith they had bene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves content with these good offers, and not to bee too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune, He expected their answer. These offers which the Embassador seemed so great, were iudged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his owne fault: and that he should not onely depart out of these few Townes, which he held in Asia and Ionis; but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keep himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadors therefore saw, that no better bargaine could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might bee with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publike businesse: He onely said thus much, That since Antiochus had alreadye forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition wherby he may haue peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if he had bene alreadye subdued: little reason there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it he must giue away. Hee had with him threecore and tenne thousand Foot, and twelue thousand Horse, besides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or sythes, according to the manner of the Eastern Countreies. Yet was he nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew nere him apace as one hastning to fight. But howsoeuer he was affected, he made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sicke at Flea, He sent thither vnto him his sonne without ranfome: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickenesse, and without desire to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That heerein he dealt craftily. For since he could haue none other ranfome of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courteisie before the battell, as would afterwards haue benee little worth; than to stay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his sonne: so as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue benee much auailable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie, Hee said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduising him not to fight vntill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus refused to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, Hee fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him Z. Scipio the Consul; and sat downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some losse driuen backe over the River. Two daies were quietly spent, whilest neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance, nor were at all opposed, vntill they came within two miles and a halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote: whom their ordinarie Corps dauntly repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul tooke aduice what was to be done. For either they must fight vpon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subiect vnto many difficulties: vnlesse they would staine their honour by returninge farre backe, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, That this great Armie should be assayed, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being very loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battells:

Hee also did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might vnderstand his meaning to fight.

The Romane Armie consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted form, were diuided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at such distance as was vsuall; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Acheans; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vnto most of all (such some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troupes of horse were placed there, though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him sixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus; they onely would haue serued to discourage his men; as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more courageous beasts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuersly appointed, and not so accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kindes, in such wise as each might be of most vtilitie. The maine strength of his Foote consisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These hee placed in the middle, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one haueing two and thirty in File, and fiftie in Front. Betwene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were sixteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, diuided in their severall kindes, doe seeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue bin stretched out in Front. Adioyning vnto these, were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A litle further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argaspiders, or Silver-shields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had serued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Footers, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Asia; with foure thousand slingers and Archers of the Circassians, & Elymaeans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and fuen hundred of diuers Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with hooks or sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would scarce to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrcassians, Elymaeans, and manie others, haueing also with them sixteene Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded in the Phalangiers.

The first on-set was giuen by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foote; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with showings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driuen out of the fildes; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Romane Horse following this advantage, charged vpon the left wing: whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with with such varieties of Auxiliaries, made litle or no resistance; but all of them fledde, in a manner, as loone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gaue vpon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Amilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discouered the approach: Hee not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further tarrance. The Campe was defended a litle while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaile fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse, besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slain above three hundred Foot, and foure and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodie of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townsmen and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow, that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yeelded vp themselves by subasfadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilst they were on the way. Neither were many daies spent, ere Antiochus his Embassador was in the Campe: haueing none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the answer, because that it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that Warre, they required fiftene thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeeres next ensuing by euery portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes, and some store of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, very earnest they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Theas the Asolian, with some others who had flired vp the King to this warre, deliuered into their hands. But any wise man might easily haue perceiued, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enioyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Vulso. The Asolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make warre vpon the Asolians; the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to bee so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soone after this, came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to bee made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approued. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned vp his owne deserts; and comparing himselfe with Masaniassa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had bene to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masaniassa was onely such in title; and since both hee and his Father had alwaies bene their friends, even in the very worst of the Romane fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what hee would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtisie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At the length hee craued they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Countrey by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giuing liberty to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had bene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodiens did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian libertie; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bin subiect vnto Philip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not alleadged against him as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gaue away so much, that euery one had 10 cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had bene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victorie had no lesse deserved; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

§. IX.

The Aetolians, and the Gallogrecques, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fuluius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to haue passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies, the Bookes of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipios: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

MARCUS Fuluius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided between them, 30 which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Aetolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Romane Majesty, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the Aetolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadors were utterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie, which was, to entreate the Rhodiens and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neyther were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuise, euen vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poore King Aminander liued in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Albanians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing beene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuered with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, vsed by the Capitaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vnderooke the worke. Yet assistance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. Hee was at the borders with a thousand Aetolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time by his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the readie assistance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Townes in the Countrey, to his vse. The fame of this good successe at first, with diuers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Thium a few dayes; giuing thereby some leasure vnto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home sixe thousand men, of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, hee left all but two thousand behinde him, and so came to Athmanum, a little Athmanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontiers of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Thium a while, to take a place lying out Argitheia, that was chiefe of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither hee, nor the King had the boldnesse to descend vpon Argitheia; for that they might perceiue the Albanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come downe vpon them, when they should be to busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially, when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Aetolians. The Macedonians were called back, from wards Argitheia, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athmanians and Aetolians way-layd them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine fight, with great losse of men and armes; few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Aetolians hauing found the businesse of Athmania so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilechians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip, from whom they diligently reuolted, and became Aetolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had bene euer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soon layd them away; seeing their neighbors ready to fight with them in the Aetolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the joy was the lesse, for that newes came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Consul his halting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take in despite, that hee had recovered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemed it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they 30 neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layd siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had bene the chiefe seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Aetolians: yet could not by them be relieved, vnlesse they would adventure to fight vpon equal ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Aetolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driuen from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilechians and Dolopians. They were vnable to 40 deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not bee terrified, by any violence of the assaillants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so bee driuen to leaue vnto his successeur the honour of finishing the Warre. Wherefore hee gladly hearkened vnto the Aetolians, and bad them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it overdeare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. Hee also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediator, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the 50 conclusion was such as was grievous to the weaker, but not vnassailable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodiens, accompanied those of the Aetolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a verie grievous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Heereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediators of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Aetolians were bound to vphold the Maiestic of the people of Rome, and to obserue diuers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any

any people of Greece; they having bene the first that called these their Masters into the Countrey. The Ile of Cyphaleia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achaens, by stiffly pressing their owne right) that so they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbear the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was set down an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Romans Iudges of their controuersies, when they should seeke after good vie will bee shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cm. Manlius, the other Consull, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallio-Greekes and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio, of whose victorie, his acts were the consummation. He visited those Counties on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at Warres, without regard of the great alteration happened in Asia. From euery of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrells found occasion to visite those Prouinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. Hee was euen loaded with bootie, when, hauing fercht a compass about Asia, he came at length vpon the den with bootie, when, hauing fercht a compass about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallio-Greekes. These had long domineered ouer the Countrey: though of late times, it so was rather the fame and terror of their fore-passed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they did serue vnder King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon the Riuer Halys, in an In-land Countrey, where those enemies were not vey like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had bene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yield: then there was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carrie or drue, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margarana. These mountains were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vnderake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or easily bee repelled; and that finally, when hee had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gallio-Greekes had bene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would haue serued well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of Armes, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallio-Greekes, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their stones before-hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive Armes, could not hold out against the Arrowes and weapons of the Romans light armature: but were driuen from a peece of ground, which they had vnderaken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steeperockes. Few of their men did escape aliuie: all their wiues, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation overcome soone after, at the other side of the mountaine: onely more of them saved themselves by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backs.

These warres being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul, his Prouince for another yeere. Fulvius, in his second yeere, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom he had vanquished, as likewise to Armenias the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. Hee also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto hee swore, and received the Kings oath oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, hauing set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellefont, laden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallio-Greekes had in so many yeeres extorted, from the wealthy Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needefull vse, which the Roman souldier had bene wont to take as the onely good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household stuffe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banqueters, and in a word, with the seedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

10 The Countrey of Thrace lay between Hellefont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his iourney homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such boie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with a huge traine of baggage, the Thracians could not so well containe themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwile than very pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were giuen to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fittie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Aetolians; promising moreover to restore vnto him all the Greece Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to giue away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Cherfonticus and Tysmachia in Eurape, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeede with his Nobilitie to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained louingly the two Scipios, which he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neere acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spain and Affricke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio had not a disposing of that which they woone from Antiochus: as neither indeede had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him, but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceede. When Philip therefore saw these vpstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, aduanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to will, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that he had ioynd with Antiochus 40 and the Aetolians, by whom he might haue bene freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be vrged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleued, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrey. They knew all aduantages; and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie, whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leaue behinde: though both the getting, and the sauing, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew to night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their 50 full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus, and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly tax, as an vnworthy Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it is sufficient that he made good answer, and was approoued by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindered the peace with Antiochus, they

they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Armie over Taurus, and aduenturing upon the calamitie threatned by Sibyls verses, unto those that should passe the fatal bounds. What calamitie or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophetic threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe over Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a sort, the Countreies on the other side of the Mount, which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeede the accomplishment of this prophetic, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptoleme King of Egypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, foresat at random in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by enent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptoleme to his Kingdome by Gabinius the Roman, should haue any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers haue bene well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophetic. Of the Sibylline predictions I haue sometimes thought reuerently: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatry, that vpon all occasions was aduanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well preailed vpon my credulitie, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not onely those prophesies of Sibyl, wherein Christ fo plainly was shewed, but euen the bookes of Akemes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever deuised them) by the vnderfet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forcine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors. Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue bene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Phylosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it bene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken a misse in place of Simoni Sango: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Virgilius a Rebelle, had many ages before bene consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sanguis, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sanguis, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their falsion is amended, and made more Historically, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richst, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those monies which the Common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deterred by him, euen so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the

the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipios were called one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Polleritic. P. Scipio the African, with whom they beganne, could not endure that such vnworthy men should count him, of purloyning from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came, hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middle of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the People, That vpon the same day of the 10 yeere he had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke warre, by a signal victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabbe at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitol, and there giue thanks to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And here hee was inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the fawenteenth yeere of his life, vntill hee now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the 20 Court, followed Scipio, leaving the Tribune alone, with none about them, excepting their owne flunies and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vntirequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceiued that the Tribune would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Litiurnum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeeres he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeere, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopomenus, as also of his priuate behauiour 30 at Litiurnum, render it probable, that hee out-lived the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to haue drawn him backe to his owne Citie, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was, the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Asiaticke. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching many receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; That the Senate should giue charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and iudicially determine thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugall also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde 40 he was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was hee vmerciful and vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being yfoned with crueltie, troubled both himselfe and the whole Citie, whilst he liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie, especially those that were in highest estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their aduancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had bene at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and like ly to carry it, hee took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perisurie. That hee had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold and silver, gotten in the 50 Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipios grew partly, (besides his generall sight at the Nobility) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checks, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did vtter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That hee had no neede of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lyes he published, or for want of iudgement, thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipios, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuerer inquite and iudgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was scene condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should haue beene laid vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his hauing beene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had beene condemned to pay, then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had beene against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kinned, friends, and Clients made such a collection for him, as would haue set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessary vse, being redeemed for him by his nearest friends.

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punicke Warre. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especial helps to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme danger. But these factitious contentions did no long while containe themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrells, grew to perfection, they that found themselves ouer-matched by their aduersaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubs & stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frays and murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sonnes, whilst they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to haue wonne a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the ciuill warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who prevailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consul had finally caused to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in neede of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cesar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailing against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subiects vnto the arbitrary gouernment of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeede attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleueed of her selfe as if shee had, whilst a King sat crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this confirmation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequelle will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deale insolently with the Acheans. The Macedonian, being vnreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius; of whom thenceforth hee becomes ialous.

After the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Acheans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arrivall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and warre, To beate Monie, and to reserve (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeals, or last resort, as euery pettie iniurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vterly dissolved. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Offices of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the feuerall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grieuous; or, as being satisfiull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiefe hope of thriuing; or, as being more fearfull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes liuing further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformance vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuersion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auailable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they very louing vnto Masaniissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion seated in Africke: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subiection vnto themselves, by the ministry of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vselful and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that he had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needefull, to transport them ouer the Hellefont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the Suites of Jessalie and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Aenus and Maronea,

Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These Townes of Enus and Maronea had bene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome : who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Transilvania : in which Prouince it is said, that hee was one of our grandfathers.

*Hist. of Hungary by Mart.
Fruice, lib 5.

He is thought to have made infinite number of gold have been found, in the age of our grandath. is, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, and on the other side with Victoria. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Selencus Nicator by right of war, to wherein he vanquished and slue Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptoleme Ceramus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Selencus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wth away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of Land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gauls being over-past, those Countries which lately had bene oppressed by them, recover'd their libertie; and not onely held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischiefes commonly done by these, 20 King Philip did provide the most conducing remedies: by shunting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of his owne Country, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Asiatics, of wrongfull vspuration and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereunto hee made a good answer, That his Garrison did onely laue it from the Thracians: who as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did leize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Aenus and Maronea: That they were places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not awaied him, in the disputation about Lysimachia; and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countie thereabout, while Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victory had gotten vnto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition. Whether Aenus and Maronea should be set at libertie: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Cherbonnus; that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges betwene him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Neuertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, to merit maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Asiatics: wherein whatsoever hee had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more. By such allegations either he was likely to preuaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had bene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselves, in pleading against him for their liberty, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions, and (as by nature he was very cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little ioy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and wilked him to let in the Thracians

ciens by night, that they might lacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done: but fo ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue bene feared, of these proceedings, that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Maieſtie, to an accompt. He would haue remoued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, beinge more inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into this outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof the willed the Embassadors to enquire, among the Maronites themſelues: as well knowing, that they who ſurquied, were either his owne friends; or fo terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durſt not venter an offence word. But he found the Romans more ſeuere, and more thoroughly informed in the buſineſſe, than to reſt contented with ſuch an answer. He was plainly told, that if he would diſcharge himſelfe of the crime objected, he muſt ſend Onumaſtus and Caffander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate ſhould thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his ſpirits, and ſaid, that Caffander ſhould be at their diſpoſition: but concerning Onumaſtus, who had not bene at Maronea, nor neere to it, hee requeſted them not to preſſe him; ſince it ſtood not with his honour, ſo lightly to giue away his friends. As for Caffander, becauſe he ſhould tell no tales; hee rooke order to haue him poiſoned by the way. By this wee ſee, that the doctrine, which Machiavel taught vnto Ceſar Borgia, to employ men in millicious actions, and afterwards to deſtroy them when they haue performed the miſdeede; was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing bene apt ſchollers in this leſſon to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witneſſe; and therein eſpecially the Lord Cromwell, who perſiſhed by the ſame vniuſt Law that himſelfe had deified, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before he was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his yonger sonne Demetrius as Embassador vnto the Senate: giuing him
30 instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wife that if ought were amiss, yet might it appeare that hee had bene
strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all cūen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate, as hauing bene well approved by them, when he was hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat where it only in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

¶ Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspence, and whilest hee, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadours, that had bene Iudges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progreesse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedemonians against the Achaïans. It was objected vnto the Achaïans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedamon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Praetor of the Achaïans, made answer, That these banished Lacedemonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they sold the blame vpon others: the Achaïans hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, they were supposed to be chiefe authours of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were comming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedamon, hee said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibit vnto them all kinds of fortifications: as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedamon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Murtherers. Further, he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wal-

him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Treater, that there they might satistie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefites by him done vnto them, especially in deliuerie them from Nabis the Tyrant: began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Diocretes and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leaue any disgrace, or iniurie, done to him, vntreuered. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had beene made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cuppe of poyson, which Philopemen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Hosties were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seuentie yeeres old, and weakened with long sickness, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achaens, when they missed him in their flight, were maruellously offended with the unskilfuls, for that they had bene more mindefull to preferue their owne liues, than to looke vnto the faticke of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were debating what to doe in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched vnto Alessene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire means would not serue. Lycortas was chosen General of the Armie against Alessene: who coming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeelde. Then Diocretes, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had bene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the alhes of Philopemen that were carried home in solemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all of them slaine at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended.<sup>30</sup> Q. Marius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. Hee would haue entemedled in this businesse of Alessene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spitefull enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Luie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuided some secret fallies vnder ground to saue himselfe from any reasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to saue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as hee well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, hee tooke the poyson vpon his owne hand, which he alwaies preferred for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduerser fortune; which being ready to swallow downe, he vttered these words: I will now (said he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath so many yeeres possessed them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius over me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer be numbred among the rest of his heroicall decdes: No; it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how farre the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their forefathers; as, when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italie, and was ready to giue them battaile at their owne dore, they gaue him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson:

son; whereas these of a later race haue employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore bene one of their Consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith giuen, and contrary to the Lawes of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliuer vp his owne Gheft. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to reuenge his infideliie, dranke off the poyson, and died.

In this yeere also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Capitaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vntfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we haue now finished, had he bene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might haue commanded such supplies, as the Warre which he vnderooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publicke force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolue it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Country and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and ialousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more vnprofitous than that of Men of Warre, and great Capitaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and ialousie of men, the spoyle, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with good reason did Moultre the Marthill of France confesse, That were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoever, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues, haue raised them above the leuell of their inferiours, and haue surmounted their enuie: yet haue they bene rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, baseness, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hercof; as Coriolanus, Antony, L. Amylius, and this our Scipio, whom wee haue lately buried. Among the Greeks we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that Dauid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Ioab. With this fare Alexander feasted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Atius: who, after many other victories, overthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was stricken in the world; for there fell of those that fought beside runne-awayes, an hundred and foure score thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Atius, hee had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slue Atius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durst attempt, Atius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Atius, the glory of the Western Empire was rather dissolued then obscured. The same vnworthy destinie, or farre worse, had Delfarius; whose vnder takings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and hee died a blinde begger. Narjes also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Iustine. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well obserued in euery age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeeda Turkish one, That euery warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Baiazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomar; Selim strangle Bassa Musapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Vsiers. Of the Spanishe Nation, the great Gonsaluo, who drave the French out of Naples; and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico, were crowned with nettles, nor with Lawrell. The Earles of Edmond and Horn, had no heads left them to wear garlands on. And that the great Capitaines of all Nations haue bene paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary it may be said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall

in consideration, that these high places haue bene giuen, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vnrped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emp. rours, which haue traitorously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vnderstandly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue, is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other than cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniuently gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustinus, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Iustine, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasi, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surpris'd his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasi, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue bene repayed with their owne cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinie, and perhaps the best way of thriving, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoile of Enemies, and the liberallitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vntankfullnesse in this kinde, hath bene found belong to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wise man therein, and he deliuered the Citie by his wisdom: but none rememberd this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thanks; which the vnwiser sort of them thinke to fauour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes coozened and abused, which proves that weaknesse to be in them: indeede, whereof they so gladly thinke the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thanks; yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines haue made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the enemy, they are very inquisiue to search into it, and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most inuiously to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, haue purloined somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I neede not to produce examples: that of the two Scipios being solatly recited.

In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie, she was constrained to vnder take, her Maiestie had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had; yet, according to the destiny of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admirall excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or other wise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Maiestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witness, who in all her dayes neuer received dishonor, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and employed.

For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randel, Drewrie, Reade, Wylford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunsable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others:

so those of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norric and Pere were the most famous, & who haue done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: those (I say) with many other braue Colonels, haue left belinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauels and wounds) nor little nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. Wilmoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Maiestie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleeue other men than her selfe, a disease vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue bene subiect, I say that such confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it nor but in some sort accuse her of weaknesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actions are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which Martiall men seldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a profession farre more noble than their owne, seeing therein they should onely minde their Matters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deserving, and of farre greater vlt than themselves.

But his Maiestie hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honoured more Martiall men, than all the Kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable seruice, as well in the yeere 1588, as in Caliz, the Flunds, and in our owne Sea; hauing first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maiestie hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russet, Carew, Danners, Arunel of Wander, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their gouernments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

Philip making provision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne subiects. His negotiation with the Bastarnæ, his crueltye. Hee suspecteth his sonne Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slaine, by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sonnes death; whom hee findeth to haue bene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on Perseus, hee dieth.

QUANTUS Martius the Roman Embassador, who trauelled vp and downe, seeking what worke might be found about Greece, had receiued instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not seeme to haue discovered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoeuer they enioyned him; yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than mere necessity should enforce him thereunto. Headed further, That all the doings and sayings of that King, did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which hee was deuising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnesse to the Romanes, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or other wise (as to him seemed apparent) by what meanes soeuer. Hee was in an ill case: as hauing bene already vanquished by them; hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet he provided as well as hee could devise, against the necessity which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romanes, hee compelled to forsake their dwellings, and remooued them all into Bithynia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith hee thought yet to be more assured, against against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, hee deuised vpon alluring the Bastarne, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Danubius, to abandon their feare, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides others, would helpe them to roote out the Dardaniens, and take possession ther great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardaniens; being of their Country. These were like to do him notable seruice against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefit that could bee hoped by their arriuall, must be the utter extirpation of the Dardaniens; a People alwaies troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoever they found advantage. Neither was it iudged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarne, by hope of spoyle, and other inticements, vnto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon that way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peraduenture some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarne from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardaniens, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious iourney vnto them, that carried with them their wines and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of diu: strengthned himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any ciuill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect: so as the Bastarne came not before such time as hee was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the training of his men to Warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Towneships, which he had caused march against their wils to forsake their ancient dwellings, & betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought conuenient for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first conuener to himselfe within words: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also hee did vnwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This euill therefore would loone haue bene determined, had not his cruell and vindicative nature made it worse. Hee could not pardon words proceeding from iust sorrow: but imputed all to traitorous malice; and accordingly did seeke reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deseruedly. This increased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a most barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom hee had iniured, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill hee should haue massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragically then perhaps he could haue desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heaven, hee felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings younger sonne. It may well bee (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissension betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius, like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreme ialousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparell, or the vnsightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were inserted in ordinarie discourse and table talk, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praying them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily consultation with their friends and counsellors, as often as they came, gaue his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit pretaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuises with his elder sonne Perseus: who tearing so much lest his brother should step betweene him and the succession, conuicted wholly vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty yeres old; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by fife yeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought olde and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discovered. The ialous head of the King hauing entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great solemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft in twaine a birch, and threw the head and fote-part, with the entrilles, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first original, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the King between his two sonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into two parts: which, vnder the Kings two sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vsing poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer earnestly seeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with those stakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was sorry for this, as it had beene some bad preface: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vse. They were of the craftier sort: who perceiuing which way the Kings fauour bent, and how all the courtes of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their seruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heate of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solempne pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to obliue what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himselfe foindly discretely, that he was taken & well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet hee would leaue none of his traine behinde, but forced them all to beare him company. They fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked vp his dores, as if he stood in feare to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondred to see himselfe excluded, and feared very angrily with his brother. But Perseus bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the same hath bene here recited, saue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom hee knew that hee should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because hee bore a due respect vnto his father, and was sorrie to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For prooffe hereof he cited a letter, sent of late from T. Quintius to the King himselfe: whereof the contents were, That hee had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome, and that he should yet further doe well to send him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honourable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence hee enforced, That this counsell was giuen by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should

should wait vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become seruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them, and had conceiued of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus; that conuerted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him, He said that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, He were more like to lose it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a iearous father. That he would conclude nothing vpon the excessse or error, whatsoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better observation of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he my seeme to haue dealt both iustly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gaue himself ouer wholly to Perseus: vsing to little conference with his yonger sonne, that when hee had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him present, nor nere vnto him. Above all, he had especial care, to learne out what had passed betwene Demetrius and T. Quintus, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadours to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interessed in the quarrells betwene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to bee written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices vnjustifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect, for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traitor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if hee <sup>30</sup> had pitted the estate of the vnhappy Prince; and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to liue in safety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than hee could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reuerſion vnto the Crowne of Macedon. Whatsoeuer his hopes & meanings were, all came to nought through the fallhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his sonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a prooffe sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accused Minister of his Kings vnadvised sentence, first gaue payson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Heereupon hee sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedie: who villainously accomplished their work by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not bene found a King, that had thus cruellie dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houſes of Lysimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or euen vpon their heales; by intestine discord and ialousies, so grounded on desire of foueraigne rule, or feare of losing it. By the like vnnatural hatred, had almost bene cut off the lines of Ptolemie and Seleucus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously disordered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that vpspring family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it selfe to marvellous greatnesse, in very short space, from the condition of weere slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly hee had reason for to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord; than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus the Tutor had faithfully cherisht him in his minority. But he was himselfe of an vnmodest nature; & therefore wintere to be a good perswader, and kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed vpon many innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his owne, did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Payson. After the death of his sonne, Herotus hee began to examine the crimes that had bene objected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriuer of the whole proccesse. His only remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause; than the removing of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to bee feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his visuall trouble of minde, and carelesse of making provision against them. Hee was more diligently cōsulted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betwene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, he was left in <sup>30</sup> a desolate, some expecting his death; and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deepe melancholy; and filled his head with suspicious imaginations; the like whereof hee had neuer bene flow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed; and so much the more, for that hee knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hateful to Perseus; and thus becoming suspect vnto the same ialous impression which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsaillour, when hee found that the anger conceiued against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the King, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that <sup>30</sup> Philocles and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the businesse: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, hee found one Xechus, a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vied by those Embassadours. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xechus for feare of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that he had bene employed by the Embassadours in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he vnderstood that by the vnnatural practice of one sonne, hee had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and <sup>40</sup> innocent. Hee ragd exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the authors of the mischief. Vpon the first newes of this disconerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philocles was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not denie it when Xechus confronted him, yielded himselfe guilty, or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flye the Countrey: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. Hee kept on the borders of the Kingdome, towards Thrace, whilst his father wintered at Demetrius. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weak body, and excessive griefe of minde, so disabled him in the trauell thereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose to effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profite. But for all the euill that befell him, hee might thinke his own perueſe condition: since his Vncle, King Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore hee was iustly punished by feeling the difference betwene the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected; and the the life of a King, whereof he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whilest yet he was onely drawing neere, was fore-signified vnto Perseus, by Caligennes the Physician; who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse imprudently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IIII.

How the Bastarne fell vpon Dardania. The behavior of Perseus in the beginning of his reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they suffered Masanissa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrell with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more vnto the Romans, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Acheans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring vpon him.

IMmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Bastarne into Thrace: where order had beene taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Countie. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as no other was knowne than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his seruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprise: then was all doubt and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markers vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarne would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Bastarne had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countie. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some overthrow, received by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether becaufe of extreme bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seems that by the careless vse of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countie.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his minde to the settling of his Estate: which well done, hee might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for warre or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion, he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; hee saue personally to heare their causes in iudgement (though herein he was too ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceived this his vertue of iustice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboue all, hee had care to amoid all necessitie of warre with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was hee negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein too excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder how in few yeeres, to his viter ruine, hee became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeede the maistring passion, which ouer-ruled his minde, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For proofe of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Istria, subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrells, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others.ouer the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victory) a heauy hand: and suffered Masanissa to take from them what hee lifted. The Carthaginians; like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Masanissa therefore had great advantage ouer them, and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force, of what he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had He once dealt before, in taking from them the Countie of Empiria; and so did he vse them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masanissa had worne some land from the Carthaginians; to which afterward Syphax came from Gala, and within awhile, restored to the right owners, for loss of his Wife Sophenisha, and of Masabal his Father-in-law. This did Masanissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose iudgement the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masanissa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them aboute seuentie Townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masanissa, invading their Countie, howsoever hee was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to beare defensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might haue fauer iustice; or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauer, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masanissa should be allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Iudges; than continually to liue in feare, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And heere withall the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping in hope to moue compassion.

Here may we behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant houle of the Barchines, of their irresolution, in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they had oft chased, slaine, taken, & sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, & in all Cities of Africk & Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often & so earnestly desired. Onely they want peace with Masanissa, once their mercinarie, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might haue beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Canna; than Hannibal that won it was vied by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, euery man of them, all his private riches, vpon the Commonwealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without crauing recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to set out an Armie into Spain, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne walls. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging vnto the vanquished. Their pittifull behaviour bredde peraduenture some commiseration, yet their reares may seeme to haue beene mistrusted, as proceeding no lesse from enuie vnto the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They thought themselves able to fight with Masanissa; which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought, of defending their owne right by armes : but contrariwise, when without leave obtained they presumed to farre, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage; had therefore not given him instructions, how to deal in that business. Only it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell divers nights, in the Temple of Aesculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be overmuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoever was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the covenants of the league, were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this mild rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians; partly for feare, partly for hope of better vantage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should be vanquished, he made none other account, than that all Africke round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been vnmindfull of Perseus. They visite him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These he entertained kindly at first, untill (which fell out ere long) he perceived where to their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania; neither would they take any satisfaction, untill the Bassarna were thence gone; though he protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did vnto other some. Where hee did harme to any; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good; they called forth his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, (vpon what occasion it is vn certaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flue Euphranor, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemed that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian; and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed to farre, vnlesse either they had been extremely provoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them, Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke very angrily this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had invaded some Countie of their Italian confederates, & not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselves haue done the part of Masanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league between them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greekes, & generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes: whom usually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hercof the Achaens had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne cariers, and whole hope of extraordinary fauour at Rome caused them them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie; yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carry any business of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuerthelesse, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to grieve; especially in vniuersing the practice of Armes, which belonged onely to the Imperiall Cities. In learning this hardihood, they were such vntoward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Romane Senate, being desirous to humble the Achaens, refused not onely to giue them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betwene them; but further, with a careless insolencie, reiected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemy might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as swearing with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedemonians, or Corinthians, would reuolt from the Achaens; they themselves would thinke it a business no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was beleueed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prator of the Achaens had utterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Achaens, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Cities) That they had strictly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained grannie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of Warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against mere strangers; without interposing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peradventure sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Romane Arts howsoever many (for gainefull or timorous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Cities in Greece, hauing neither subiects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practice their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flatterings the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Mithridates: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence stroue to preferre their liberties and lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to bee deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vnpleasant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to haue offence, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow than to breake.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betwene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, wherinto Greece was likely to bee reduced, by the Romane patronage. Indeede they not onely perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrey, and would for no ambition, or other senule respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone be at an end; when honestie and loue of the Common weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful prouision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly aduertised: yetther because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to bee little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom euery Citie in Greece had too many) as were men vnto regarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from these that are feared or flattered by many. The Achaens being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceiue the aduantage, which mischievous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that he chose much rather to betray his Countrey, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence, and alleading what was meetest in iustificacion of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppress both the Achaens and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the settling of their authority, among his froward Countreymen; if they meant not wholly to forsake it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee regarded; any iniunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achaens both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if Hee, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wills: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columnes or Monument erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to giue eare vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vtterd to be more plausible, than any discoursetending against it: yet if they which vnderooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase apace, & they became the prevalent faction. It was therfore strange how the Fathers could so neglect the aduancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greekes who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert, only for hauing vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughlie those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolved to follow this good counsaile, in euery point; yea to depreesse all those that held with the right, and to set vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achaens, than had beene their manner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto all Cities of Greece; requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedaemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates; they aduised all men, to be such and so affected, as hee was, in their feuerall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Countrey into the way of ruine; but himselfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheless hee forbore to vaunt himselfe; of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Onely hee so reported his Embassage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherewith hee threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts he obtained to be made Pretor of the Achaens: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, hee omitted nothing, that might serue to manifest his ready obsequiousnesse vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatening termes wonne many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberrall gifts, and hopeful promises, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeste than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting onely the good of the Estates, whereto they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable, That a King, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: whercof if not any one alone, yettall of them together, shall afford them iust occasion to make warre vpon him. Perseus hauing finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a iourney to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his Armie along with him; yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his iourney, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe, to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoeuer, done by his father, might be buried with his father; since his owne meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could haue bene pleased better, if hee had behaued himselfe after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken such a iourney, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heape of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the loue of the Achaens: which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was ieaalousie perhaps, no less than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by manie vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, giuen them cause to abhorre him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall consent, they resolved to forsake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preservation of concord among them, to vse all circumspection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Warre, and when all danger of innouation was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nouishing deadly hatred, without leauing means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achaens reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdom of Macedon: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should aduancethither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaues very profitable vse. But Perseus tooke hold vpon this occasion: as fitly seruing to pacifie those, whose enmity saue he would haue changed into loue. Hee therefore apprehended all these fugitiues, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achaens, That as for good will vnto them, hee had taken paines to restore back their seruants; so should they do very well to take order for keeping them, thit heereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily vnderstood, & his letters kindly accepted by the greater party; being openly rehearsed by the Pretor, before the Councell. But Callicrates took the matter very angrily, and bade them be aduised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Heerevnto hee tooke vpon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achaens before-hand acquainted with the Warre, that was coming vpon Perseus from Rome. Hee told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had bene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly Heere heard all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarnes, vpon the Dardaniens; the Kings iourney against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behauiour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the event of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Heereto good answer was made by the Prators brother: That Callicrates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renewed his league with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that Hee had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This being so: why might not the Achaens, as well as the Atolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greekes, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuerthelesse Callicrates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-stiffly gainsay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answer made the whilest, That since the King had onely sent a letter without an Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would needs vige them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to giue audience: which was prooue sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued. For harkening to this aduice of Callicrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassadour: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonians; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

§. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodiens and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and condemnes his enemies the Rhodiens; with the causes thereof. The vnusuall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt vpon Eumenes. The brotherly love betwene Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his deuice to possion some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had bene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Antistridates his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom hee was animated with comfortable words, and promise. That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesse, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this being at good leisure, he began to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore hee was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonians; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on) his father and him) began to waxe euery where stale: whilest Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodiens his old friends: and in helping the rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore & indirekt courses of reuenge. The Lycians could not bee faued by his patronage, from seuerer and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodiens. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a Decree of the Achaens, as too vnmeasured, misbecoming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which hee needed not to haue regarded, had hee not bene too vainly ambitious) befell him, especially for his being ouer-seruicable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell, the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse heereof; hee thought it in vaine to strive any longer with bouny, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therefore hee resolved euen to ouerturne the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans vterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompensed with some piece of the Kingdome, as he had bene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end hee made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnes into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermeddling in businesse of neighbours, his riches, and his great prouisions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Onely he descended into particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, That Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse, of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great. The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Soldiours as many as hee should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen, either to lye vpon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subiects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Selencus the sonne and successor of Antiochus the Great, had giuen his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Selencus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these mariages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loth to vter it plainly) That euen the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied, or iustified (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans; & that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; since it would be to Himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to beleue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should set vpon them in Italie. Neuerthelesse forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so that He told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadors, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them; their iniustice, and oppression, would haue bene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this iustificatiion of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; their more then vniuersall curiostie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand

it by poyson: Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it vnto him, vntill he would yeelde to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to haue bene so confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enemies more calme. Hee caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long bene collecting against him, and where with Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that Hee had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samos, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue stood vpon the euidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxa. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well-belo-ued, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage, calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better then meere spies. Finally, he promised to giue them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeede onely for feare: but with-ed them to defend to more equal conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduise, as they might also doe for theirs.

Polyb. lib. 9. In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is set downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Liuie inserts a clause, whereby he was expressely forbidden, to make any war abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had bene restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which Perseus was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vige this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very iust reason to finde himselfe aggriued. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as vnjust, he ministred occasion vnto the Embassadors, to giue him defiance.
Having heard the worst of their message, he commanded them to be gone out of his kingdom in three dayes. But either he should haue bene lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serue him to vnderstande the warre; he should courageously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediately, whilest the Enemy was vnprepared, not haue lost opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worke peace than the former.

The Romans sollicite the Greekes, to ioyne with them in the warre against Perseus. How the Greekes stand affected in this warre. The timor of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador deludes him with hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field, and winnes part of Thessalie. The forces of Titinius the Roman Consul: and what his assistants the Romans had in this warre. Of Tempe in Thessalie: and what aduantages the Macedonian had, at which he had but lost by his feare. Perseus blazes the Romans; fights with them; knowes not how to use his victory; sets for Peace: and is denied it by the extinguisht. Perseus having this done, in a stormy season, for takes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Romans rebuke against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders are unfortunate in the warre against Perseus. They vex the Greekes their friends; for whose sake the Senate makes provision, hearing their complaints. The flattering Alexander.

Perseus had the Romans become seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that yett might they haue bene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) bevnioled in positions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre; whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and rayoied other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others, who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeede any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and strike part with the Macedonian: such were inclined the same way. Neuerthelesse Embassadors were sent to deale with them all, and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtisie: and vnderstood, that not only such as made refusall, but even they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly, were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in pursuing the best of their helpe to the Romans; the Acheans and Rhodians, which were the life among them, being rather to doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their dueitie. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to let vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue seen the ruine. The vulgar sort was euery where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers at some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished a better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though Hee iudgeth the victory of Perseus, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeavours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that an extraordinary feare, and not onely recurrence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Acheans and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vnderaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not onely to his owne Kingdome, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speake the enemy faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery small thing would serue to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Roman power, by

by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon those which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeede a great noise, leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few Townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finewesse in cunning then was vsuall among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the King desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Pemum. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Where to though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might haue done much, ere the Roman Armie could haue bene in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; hee sufficed a most convenient season, of winning vpon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bene with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation betwene him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhadians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded: not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betwene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helpes. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honour, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearfulness might seeme excusable; and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly 30 their owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the warre, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, mengrew daily more and more auerse from him; and were careful, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhadians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to doe against the good liking of the Romans. The Bacotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: so whom further, in a sort, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused thre severall Townes to make covenant apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebell) haue such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This worke, of separating the Bacotians from Thebes their head; was more than Agesilanus could effect, or Epinondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedaemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epinondas; and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedaemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the truce: yet and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie, where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprooued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne, the Senate being resolu'd before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the wals, in the Temple of Bellona (the vsuall place of giuing audience to open open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short waiting of cleane dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore countenance onely to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest; but it was a likely meane, both to keepe a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Laetinius, the Roman Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soone, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue roused Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he contented to deliberate awhile. Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeme their good will with some part of his Kingdome; that so he might enioy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsel prevailed; which also was the wisest, and so would haue proued, had it bene stoutly and wisely followed. He now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. Hee caused all his forces to be drawne together, and appointed their Rendezvous at Citium, a Towne in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to know not what Athena, that was peculiarly honored in his Country; and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof 40 about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were Frangians, of sundry Nations, of about Thracians; the rest of his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their severall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but answered, That his owne provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them onely to furnish him with carts, for his 30 engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Country, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wenne by force. Of these last was Myra, a Towne thought impregnable, and therefore not more stoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a silly; which the Townesmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of warre was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Pelaeia and Comus (townes of much importance, especially Comus, which stood in the freights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycyrium, a Towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Laetinius the Consul brought with him onely two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the severall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masaniissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young sonne, there to be brought vp: yet he did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had bene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptoleme (though Ptoleme was then young, and vnder Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Thyrian was inclinable to the Macedonians, yet yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie trick, wherewith M. Lucritius, the Roman Admirall brother, serued him, for this his counterfeite good will. This king had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the haue of Dyrrachium, vnder taint to what purpose: all which Lucritius tooke away, after a very kind sort, making shew to beleue, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had lent this fleet. But whatsoeuer Gentius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his kingdom and himselfe, in the end of this warre; by offering, rather then giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painfull iourney, through the mountainous Countrey of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had beene ready attending to his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great ouerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Penens; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the Countrey. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected: to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heauie yoke of bondage to the Macedonians, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needefull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, exceeding full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poetrie) with their Spurres or branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vntill they would make an hungry iourney, thorow the countrey of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might haue had, if by so mispending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse, yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done farre greater things, had he seized vpon the streights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the Countrey behinde the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans haue either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to be found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needefull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if hee would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuid, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Aetolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as wee shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Boeotians, how politickly foeuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after awhile began to wauer, when they saw so things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and increased the number of his well-willers; yea and bought downe with money (as he might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their impious pironage ouer Greece, & to render the liberty, by them giuen, entire; which otherwife was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue beene expected expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted; would haue won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to avoid the danger of that warre, wherof he should haue sought the honour, he left his friends that would haue stood by him, and gaue them cause to provide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, hee chose rather to set his backe to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to be driuen into such miserie, as was inevitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessalie, is to is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches and lay till encamped by the Riuer of Penens, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the field; by waisting the land of the Phereans their confederats. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduantage euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At this comping they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Capitaine, and some other of these were slaine; but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. This day after day, awhile together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldnesse much increased; and much more his reputation: to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The Towne of Sycyrium, where Perseus then lay, was twelues miles from the Romans: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but hee was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thisty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconueniences, he found out a lodging, seauen miles neerer to the enemy: whom hee visited the next day by the Suane riuer. His coming at such an vnusuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessarie, and resolved to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore hee sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Capitaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature to trie their fortune: hee himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retreat) with little losse of his owne. But hee discovered his weaknesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Capitaines, though vnfit for: he neuerthelessse tooke it for found aduice, which indeede was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which means it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalte the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it beene greater, and had hee wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue beene the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victory, what else did hee, than proclaime vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twentie horse and sortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud termes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Asians were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Five of them, that were men of especiall mark, had bene obserued to be the first which turned their backs: an obseruation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then must they aduenture no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne libertie. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, he not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safetie; whither they could neuer haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or giuen better heede to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to haue rowted them whilst they were conueying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue bene done, since there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoyle of them without resistance, as yielding themselves ouercome. With such braue words did the King set out the glory of his action; diuiding the spoyle among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor sound. He came neuer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betwene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuertheless he was easily perswaded to se the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent vnto the Consul, and offered to yeld vnto the same Conditions, wherein his Father had bene bound to the Romans; if the warre might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadors might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perseus would yeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius, to be so resolute in aduersitie. On the other side, it argued a faint heart in Perseus, that having receiued an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himselfe backe to Sycorium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagenes the sonne of Maianissa, with the aide before mentioned. This distance betwene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their harraunt: about which businesse they ranged all ouer the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which he attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the forragers; he had a good hand vpon them, if he could haue withdrawn it, and giuen ouer in time. But whilst he stroue to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, saue onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Comus; hoping to haue taken it, it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe vnto the Perrethians and others; from whom he won some townes, &c. among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme not to haue belonged vnto the Thessalians, yntil then, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalia.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defectiue. One may thinke it strange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Naue on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other partie Townes, which by that same distraction of the Bœotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had bene. The causes hercof were to haue bene sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoyling them, that hee would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreame oppression he could haue driuen them to farr. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, at such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Only this is said in generall; That in the warre which hee made, hee cruelly and countenously demeaned himselfe.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hestilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hestilius shewed more of his indolence, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonian Tor concerning the Roman warre vpon his kingdome, after that the Consul had fought passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines. Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeede on that side which looked towards Thracia, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Armie of 30000 tourne thousand, and who, by leaues made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Psiana, a border Towne of Thracia, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger, called forth vpon him, one threw him, and chaled him so farr, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this Towne of Psiana shortly after became Ægwan: which howsoeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recouered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, reuolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painefull iourney into Attolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee took in Aperantia, and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe thoroughly beaten by Cleitus, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian warre vnder Hestilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors traueiling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speech tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by might and maine to aduance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycoartus that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemenus; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achaean horse; but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue bene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstaied from railing troubles, more for lacke of opportunity, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no color of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such tales; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hostages, and found some in the Countie that approued the motion; as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garriſons beſtowed in their Townes. But neither the one nor the other of theſe propoſitions tooke effect. They of the Roman nation, accuſed not onely ſuch as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but alſo the good Patriotes; making it no leſſe than a matter of treaſon, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary ſide, there wanted not ſome, who roundly told theſe pick-thankes of their baſe flatterie; rating them openly in ſuch ſort, that one of them hardly eſcaped being ſtricken, euen in preſence of the Embaſſadours. Thus was all full of accuſations and excuſes: among which the Embaſſadors carried themſelves, as men that could beleue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The beſt was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and publiſhed, to this effect: That it ſhould be free for all men, to reſuſe obedience to any Roman Magiſtrate, impoſing any burthen for the preſent warre, vnleſſe it were ſuch, as the Senate had likewiſe thought meete. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or ſeemed, a good remedy of many inconueniences. But they that ſtanding on priuiledge hereof, reſuſed to fulfill euery commandement, were numbred among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worſe, than to haue bene Traytours. The Senate was driuen to ſet downe this order; by reaſon of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magiſtrates, and eſpecially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortenſius. Lucretius was condemned in a great ſum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they vied not to haue their ſubiects oppreſſed. Hortenſius being ſtill in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embaſſages that came to Rome about this time, either to ſeek redreſſe of iniuries, or to offer their ſeruices: it is more-worthy, that from Alabanda, a Towne of the leſſer Aſia, there was preſented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a moſt baſe piece of flatterie. Theſe Alabanders brought three hundred horſemens targets, and a crowne of gold, to beſtow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a deſire to gratifie the Romans with ſome exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be ſingular; and being nor able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuerſarie games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddeſſe. Now who can wonder at the arrogant ſoldey of Alexander, Antigonius, Ptoleme, and the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the ſhameleſſe flatterie of ſuch as beſtowed vpon men, and not the moſt vertuous of men, diuine honors; when hee ſees a Towne of houſes, wherein powerfull men dwell, worſhipped as a goddeſſe, and receiued (without ſcorne of the giuers, or ſhame of the preſent) the title of Deiue, at the gift of ſuch a raſcal Citie as Alabanda?

§. VII.

Q. Marius the Roman Conſul, with extreme difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perſeus in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by Mattius, repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill ſucceſſe. Their affaires in hard eſtate. Mattius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius ſent Embaſſadour to Mattius from the Achaens. Polybius his honeſt wiſdome beneficiall to the Achaens. King Eumenes grooves auerſe from the Romans. Perſeus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His ſaſe dealing with Gentius King of Illyria; whom he drawes into the Roman warre. He ſends Embaſſadors to the Rhadians; who vainly take vpon them to be arbitrators betwene him and the Romans. Perſeus ſeeth a mighty ſuccour of the Baſſarna, by his wretched perſimonie.

After two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began, which had bene thought likely to reforme all thoſe Countries, and bring them to what paſſe the Romans deſired; as it did in the end. Perſeus had hitherto the better, and was ſtronger now, than when he liued in peace. Hee had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian ſide; his friends in all parts of Greece, tooke courage daily, and his reputation grew ſuch, as cauſed thoſe that were before wholly Roman, to ſuſpect what the iſſue of the warre might proue, and thereupon to become wiſe for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, Licinius and Elſtius the Conſuls, had one after the

the other ſpent their time in vaine, ſeeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conqueſt, by very many loſſes receiued. The Romane Admiralls had ſo demeaned themſelves, that many Townes, euen of the beſt affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Romans ſide; and the Armie much leſſened, not onely by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſull himſelfe (for they laid the blame one vpon the other) in licencing the ſouldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded vnto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which neuertheleſſe was more then he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of men. Hee began holy to ſet the warre on foot, which a long time had ſlept. And hee began the right way: not ſeeking to force the ſtreights that were ſurely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountains which were thought able to forbid all paſſage ouer them, without helpe or need of any cuſtodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way hee meant to take, diſtributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit aſcent. But the Conſul proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be diſcouered by the Enemy, or to breake through all oppoſition, or at leaſt wiſe, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they ſhould haue that lay to ſtop him, and at length, if all failed to make a ſafe retreat. He ſent before him foure thouſand of his moſt expedient foot, to diſcouer the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had ſight of the Enemy, that lay to denie their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe peece of ground; and ſent backe word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diſmayed at his arrival, but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Camp at night, with little loſſe on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue ſcarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe, it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to returne. Wherefore Martius tooke the onely courſe remaining; and indeed the beſt: Part of his men hee left with Popilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whileſt hee, with the reſt, ſet a compaſſe about, and fought out wayes that neuer had bene troden. Herein hee found extreme difficultie: which notwithstanding hee overcame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch iourneys, through places vnfit for habitation: hee was compelled, by labour of hand, to make paths where none were, yea where Nature might ſeeme to haue intended, that none ſhould be. So ſteepe he found the deſcent of the mountaines, in this way which hee tooke: that of ſeuene miles, which they trauelled the firſt day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themſelves downe; as not daring to truſt their feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with rockes, that ſtood one ouer another, ſo vpright, and cumberſome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy proſpect; and caſting their gouernours, made a terrible noyſe, which affrighted the horſes; and bredde great confuſion. Hauing therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grievous iourney; there was nothing more deſired by the ſouldiers, than that they might be ſuffered to creep backe againe, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kind of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliſſe; the other ſuſtained by two long poſtes, ſtained in the ground below. Vpon theſe two poſtes, or poles, which indeede (not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould bee either cut or broken) were ſtained two rafters, anſwerable in length to the diſtance, betwene the higher and the lower fall: ſo as the end of one bridge might reach vnto the beginning of another. Theſe were covered with planks and turfe; that they might ſeeme continent with the ground; ſo to make the beaſts aduenturous to goe vpon them. If there were a plaine of any good extent from the foote of a rocke, to the next downefall; then might the bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, vpon one of theſe, the poſts vpholding the ſtame were cut aſunder; thereby cauſing him to ſinke downe vnto the next bridge; whence he was conueyed in like manner, to the third, and onward ſtill to the verie bottom. Thus went they downe ſliding, ſome on their feet, others on their burrockes, till they came to a greene valley. By this it appeares, how thoroughly provided the Romans vſed to be in their iourneys, of things needfull in all occaſions: as alſo what inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conueyance of themselves and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested, staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should haue ouertaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeyes were like vnto the first: saue that custom, and the nearnesse to their waies end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men vpon the passage, three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might well heare haue heard the noyse. Yet was hee so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, saue hearkening after the euent. Four onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romanes were vnable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seeke any other way, must bee saine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof onely the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, saue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foote of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the river Helicon becoming there a lake, and called Baphyras, took vp the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily haue bene fortified. Besides all this, there was in the midst of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurs of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neere to the verie banks of Peneus, a goodly and deepe river which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had bene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome journey: if Perseus could haue seene his owne aduantages. For the Roman Army was not onely in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauell: but must needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the same way that it came, if the King had made good the sight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemed a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy from above their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though hee knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdome had often bene invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were arrived, there was no means to escape, without enforcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. For hee no sooner heard that the Enemy was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; then hee fared like one out of his wits; saying, That hee was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Heere withall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry away in haste; and straight waies abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, hee sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though some after, his master grew sorry for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so hee prevented the damage. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful prouidence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon, it rested in the Kings interpretation. The reward of their seruice was this. Perseus, growing alarmed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in his hastic directions, caused those both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diving, were payd their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are prynces to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone surely work, for the hiding of his fault; then must hee so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleeue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacitie. Hee thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Aclepiodatus, from defence of the passages, where-to they were by him appointed; he rated them openly, saying, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemy the gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance; and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing trauelled about a daies journey, and gotten one towne that yielded, hee was compelled by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the warre: but hauing left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the prouisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had bene careful to occupy one of the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might come be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this come, which was most desirously expected, hee forooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish iourney (if not worse then foolish) hee lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bene worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwie it had bene madnesse to put himselfe on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemy, hee should befaie to quire it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behooued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe; and vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore means as haue been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. Hee quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which hee hastily repaired, finding it dismanted by the Romanes. This done; he encamped strongly by the river of Empicus: meaning thence to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue been enough, not onely to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romanes to seek a good end of the warre vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Onely the towne of Heraclea, standing on the river of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not giuen vp for feare. After this Martius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the King further off: although his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. Hee sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the Sea-Townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fieldes about Thessalonica were waisted; and some companies, that sundry times aduentured forth of the Towne, were still put to the worke. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming nere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ran along by Enia, and Antigonea, (standing neere to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) vntill he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes ioynd with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this access of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were were arches in the towne-wall filled vp with that earth, and covered with one single row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by fapping of the walls. To this worke he appointed such as he thought meetest: giving an alarme to the other side of the Towne, thereby to shadow his attempt, the breach was soon made. But whilest the Romans were shouting for ioy, and ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceived what was done; and salying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were betwene the ditch and the wall; of whom they flew about fixe hundred, and suffered few to escape vnwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the towne which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meete to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: wherinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not onely sufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his iourney to Demetrias, by Melibus; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without worke) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddenly ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dilodge in all haste, setting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises; euer since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelesly) most vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, then is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Aegipolis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclaea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeketo finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeite. And so were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not onely for that the extraordinary comitence, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Genius the Illyrian, did set out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good flecte, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherein he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated: though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his armie. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Praetor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so vnable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or anew armie be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had beene driuen from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himselfe like a man of warre: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craftie master, with a restless working diligence. This indeede neither proued his sufficiency, nor commended his honestie; since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheless, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such delight as weak and busie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Countrey. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Holmilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessalie, Archo, Egyptus, and other good Patriotes among the Achaens, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Achaens should send their whole power into Thessalie, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was leuiued; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadours vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Armie; and awaited the Consuls leisure till they came to Heraclaea, where finding the time conuenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein soeuer it should bee commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but said, that he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achaens, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labirynthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achaens be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius, musing and vnable to resolve whether it were for loue to the Achaens, thit the Consull was so earnest in this businesse; or rather for enuie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councill touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as hee was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was giuen him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuate, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleging that he had no need: In this case therefore, hee had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Romane Commanders should require, vlesse by special order from the Senate; the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Heereby the Achaens were fauours, of more then an hundred and twenty talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countreys behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare lest the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kinde, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerway all other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martius; but comming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as hee did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that hee refused to leaue behinde him certaine horse of the Gallagreekes, being requested to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romans good seruice: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. But it is more generally receiued; that Eumenes gaue a willing eare to Perseus his desire of accord, for meere desire of gaine. And it might well be, that couetousnesse drew him on, in the course, wherinto indignation first led him. Howsoeuer it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that hee was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertilements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betwene a King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vsed the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, enough to manage this Warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to govern their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by hearesay, and censure by idle reports: for hee told them plainly, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Amilius, who died valiantly in the Battaille of Carna. So might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselves the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Amilius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his iourney; with an especial hope of men, that hee should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more then 10 could haue bene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the wind came faire, he set sayle at break of day, and arriued safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth night he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in fife dayes more. So are there but fife of the nineteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus strongly encamped at Dium; hauing spared no labor of men and of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was fordable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling 20 way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were ten miles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea shoare and the foote of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amilius of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amilius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare, where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not aboue the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging any neerer to the enemy, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the riuer of Peneus; where hee had watered at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of any worth. Yet w<sup>as</sup> the Romane Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonians, 30 as it presently did; the passage onward being defended as hath bene already shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquire was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire iourney. Martius eyther had not bene informed heereof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the aduerture; they fearing lest it would proue such a piece of worke as had bene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie, to command. Hee had reformed, euen at his first coming, many disorders in the Romane Campe: teaching the souldiers among many other good lessons, to bee obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had bene their manner, to examine the 40 doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about fife thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Amelianus and C. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adoped; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darkenesse tooke away their ayde, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the Fleet; where victualls were provided for their iourney: it being noyted, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the Country. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay, rather to diuert the Kings attention from that which was his mine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Channell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-well-neare all drie, yet it serued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Amilius employed none saue his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had aduantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Tower which Perseus had rayled on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Amilius persisted as hee had begunne; and continued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to teach the Macedonians, that some greater worke was in hand: since otherwise a good Captaine, as Amilius was knowne to bee, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such brauadoes, that were some- 10 what costly. But Perseus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully down the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed then any of the rest. Order was forthwith giuen to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their iourney. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came some what neere to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrows and slings could doe little seruice, were beaten at hand-strokes: so as the different 20 relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, Seane Epistle of Scipio, may each of them haue bene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had bin effected by Martius in the yeere fore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunitie.

Perseus was in an extream doubt what course to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: hauing ben taught by the last yeeres example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But faire worse counsaile prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King relucet to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing beside to put himselfe into any one Towne, lest that should be first of all besieged; and hee therein 30 (as cowardly natures alwaies are ialous) not ouer-carefully relucet. This was euen the same that Amilius, or any invader, should haue desired. So a place was chosen neere vnto Pydna, that serued well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There hee abode the coming of the enemy, who layed not long behinde him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had hastened away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Amilius told 40 him, That he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their iourney; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, saue onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made stand: and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonians, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out & entrenched behinde the Armie, whereinto, at good leisure, hee fell backe, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, hee excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemy, who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground seruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere bene Prætor, foretold vnto the Consul, and (with his good liking) vnto the Armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to bee the same night: willing the souldiers not to bee troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might bee knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Brasse and Bassons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone

great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpitius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, wherein they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted; rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not heere stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause any alteration in ciuill affaires, and matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of obseruation it is, how superstition captiuates the vnderstanding of the wisest, where the helpe of true religion is wanting. Amilius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor about the reach of humane vnderstanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with any deuout regard thereof; yet could he not refrain from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice her deliuerie, as soone as the thone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpitius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish deuotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senator, and one of the Councill for Warre, w<sup>ch</sup> partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entailes of the beasts. At length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victorie to Amilius; but with condition, That hee should not giue the onlie. Hercules w<sup>ch</sup> a Greece, and patinell, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonians than the Romane. Wherefore it had bene better to call vpon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Cite, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Dautie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore w<sup>ch</sup>ld haue limited his fauour, with no inuincions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaille; Amilius was throughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his Pyrrus had retired to retire whether hee listid, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait vpon aduantage, without making any great haste. Neyther was it to be neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would bee much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Amilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likely hood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which where: neither of the Generalls had ouer-earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering: which two or three of the Romane souldiers followed into the river, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the Water, to draw this horse out to their owne side. These fell to blows, as in a private quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His Countreman seeing this, hastened to reuenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the river. Heereupon company came in, and helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaille, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flatte leuell, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with liuely words: which the present condition could bountifullly afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the lesse maruaille, that hee durst adventure battaille, since hee had bethought himselfe of such a stratagema, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, hee liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose vnreasonable deuotion could bee no better than hypocritic. For hee that will pray for a good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground: When therefore the King returned to the battaille, hee found it no better than lost; and he, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as wee find recorded, are, That the Romane Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse on wards, and beat off all which came before it, as Amilius was therat much astonished. That the Pelagii rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them slaine; and the squadrons following them so disbairged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduers to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to haue rent his coat-armor for grieft. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his deuoyre, the victorie might haue bene his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaille, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost the impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small battallions pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it, it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worke) that some files hauing open way before them, should aduance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This comming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by the Romane Targettters; according to the direction giuen by Amilius, when hee saw the front of the Enemies great battaille become vnequall, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx proued vnauailable against many small squadrons, as it had bene formerly in the battaille of Cynoscephala: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vneuiueable against the other, by reason, that being not euery where alike distressed, it would breake off itselfe; though there were little such incommenience of ground, as had bene at * Cynoscephala.

Perseus, when hee saw his battaille begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good seruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who slew about twenty thousand of them; though hauing little cause to be furious, as hauing lost, in that battaille, only some fourescore, or sixescore men at the most. Some of the foote, escaping from the execution, ouertooke the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: euery one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For hee fell to deuising vpon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella; hee found his Pages and household seruants, ready to attend him, as they had bene wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaille, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnreasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischief: he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends hee had with him only Euander (who had bin employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about 500. Cretians; more for loue of his money than of him. To these he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though shortly hee coozed them of some part thereof; making shew as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaille hee came to Amphipolis; where he exhorted the Townes-men to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to speake what himselfe would haue uttered. But the Amphipolitians made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves.

Vpon

Vpon the first fame of the ouertrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garison: sending them forth vnder color of a gainefull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to be ridde of the King; they plainly made Euander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which hee had there, in cert. ine vessells that hee found in the river Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to liue safe, by the priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

The miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the Kingdome fell into the power of Amilius, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was neereft at hand, was the last that yielded. About fixe thousand of the souldiours, too were of sundry Nations, fledde out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Stippus who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had bene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yielding had bene sent the Towne of Beraa, whither they had retired out of the battell. With the meselues and the Towne of Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within three dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole body of all sense and strength. Neyther did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Country: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Romane Armie. Amilius sent abroad into the Country, that such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same wherof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. Hee sent these letters by person of such meane condition; that his case was pitied, for that hee wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in termes ill be seeming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus, the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and so would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuerthelesse, in this conference, hee was maruellous earnest, that hee might bee allowed still to retaine the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preferred his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and to bee called King. 40 Yeat seemes that hee had indeede, euen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the Warre, hee was dehorred by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for such a paltrye Ile; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that wasthere. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrged him to giue place vnto necessity, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octavius the Romane Admirall, with his fleet: who affayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, 50 hee had now alreadye imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samothrarians; How they durst pollute their Temple; by receiving into it one that had violated the like priuiledge of Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothrarians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, wherof vntlesse he can cleare himselfe in iudgement, hee must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Maiestie, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with

with the same crime. But what will this auail, when the minister of the fact being brought into iudgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore willed Euander to haue consideration of the little fauour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be presidents and ouerseers of this iudgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, than none other hope remains, than hope to make good will, cause, where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this Euander seemes to like well: and either kils himselfe, or hoping to scape thence, by deferring the times, is wrore to get poyson where with to end his life, is killed by the Kings commendement. The death of this man, who had stucke to Perseus in all times of neede, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leane him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holy Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gainesay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which prizes him from captiuitie; he purpoeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Corys his good friend, into Thrace. Orosander a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship; who easily was persuaded to wait the King thence. With all fecrecie the Kings money, as much as could be so conueyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himselfe, 20 with his wife and children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by a rope, and ouer a mudd wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, hee found no Orosander there: the Cretians had played a Cretian trick, and he was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recover the Temple. He ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enterie the common way, lest he should be taken; he hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquire; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all 30 the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace; that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victory compleate. If hee had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than of reigning therein; he might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by diuiding his cogitations, and pursuing, 40 at once, those contrary hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that haue benee wretched by their owne default. He was presently sent away to Amphissa; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Amphilius vied to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answere might haue bene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearefull silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercy of the people of Rome. After these 50 good words, being invited to the Consuls Table, and respectfully entreated, he was committed prisoner to Q. A. Lim.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after foure yeers continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory wherof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

And hereto Callierates was very vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, he and his fellows should be made to pay for their michieuous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Achaens: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callierates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perfens. This being so; he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, hee would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, wee will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Pretors, as many as I had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence; then should I likewise haue beene friend to Perfens: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall thoroughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassadour laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purgethemselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited aboue a thousand; willing them to appeare and answer before the Senate. This might euen be termed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that v. true, and regard of the publick libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their coming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achaens. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of the innocent men could be remaining: since honestie had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achaens, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Country, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any solicitation of the Achaens, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; yne after seauentene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom 30 that well and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison, or hauing made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome; or whilit out of wayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserue the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiours, gave order, That the whole Country of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Amylius with michieuous subtiltie. Having taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; he sent vnto the Epirots for ten of the principall men out of euery Citie. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Siluer which they had; and sent along with them, inquiry of their Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, euery one the Towne wherein to he was sent. Thus in one day were threecore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiours; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserued punishment, as hauing fauoured Perfens. 50 But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had beene already sent into Italie, there to receiue their due; and since this Nation, in general, was not only at the present in good obedience, but had euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleue it, had any one Writer deliuered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that God was pleased to make Amylius childlesse, euen in the glory of his triumph, how great soeuer otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greekes and Macedonians.

Ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

The Warre of Antiochus vpon Agypt, brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

- 10 Antiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his raigne and life. He died the sixe and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the seuenteenth or eighteenth of Ptolemie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or according to Iustine of Iupiter. He left behinde him three sonnes, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom hee had giuen in marriage to Ptolemie Epiphanes, King of Agypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes; reigned in Syria twelve yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was sloathfull by nature; so the great losse which his father Antiochus had recieued, to kee him from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this iudgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall start vp a wilde person, unworthy the honour of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successour Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Maccabees take beginning. Which bookes seeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successours, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successour of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabaeus (who died in the hundred threecore and seuenteenth yeere of the Greekes in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second booke, although he take the storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Iason the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, preuailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successour, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Ianssonius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadours to the Greekes, Ionathan the brother and successour of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereof Iosephus addes, that the name of the Lacedaemonian Embassadour was Demetrius, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding 50 a Dragon in her claws.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greekes in Syria. He was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he vsurped from his brothers sonne.

Ptolemie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had bene about seuen yeeres King of Agypt.

Ptolemie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Agypt foure and twenty yeeres, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his Kingdome betweene them, whilst he was a childe. But they found such other businesse, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vsuall purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Prouinces of Calasyria, Phenice, and Iudas, which he had won by his victory ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby hee liued in the greater securitie. He left behinde him two sons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subiects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdome, his younger brother being set vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing succour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vp on him the protection of the young Prince, fought by all means possible to possesse himselfe of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnesibemus Embassadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to assist the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to with the principall places of that Kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephewes safety and well doing. And the better to answer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came hee alongst the coast of Syria to Ioppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Ierusalem, where, by Iason the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Partion) he was with all pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleall pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Governour of Calasyria and Phenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heauen; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angell of God, and recovering againe at the prayer of Onias; yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threecore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So he got his desire, though he not long inioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Iason, and his being ouer-reached by another in the same kinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achaeans, when as that mischieuous Callicrates, who had bene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more sore;
One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does fly.
So one most mischieuous of men before,
Callicrates, false knaue as knaue might be,
Met with Menalcidas more false than he.

And euen thus fell it out with Iason: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iason thereupon being forced to flye from Ierusalem, so and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty armie of land-forces, Hewens about to raigne ouer Egypt, that he might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entered Egypt with a mighty company with, Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Nanie, and moued warre against Ptolemieus King of Egypt; but Ptolemieus was afraid of him, and fled, so many were wounded to death.

He won many strong Cities and tooke away the spoyle of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled 67.

Prophecie of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentyfull Prouinces, and he shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuerindeede had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victory ouer the Egyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For he gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Pelusium and the Iull Cassius, after which he entered, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, he turned againe, and went vp towards Irael and Ierusalem with a mighty people, and entered proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlesticke for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Poring Vessels, and the Bodes, and the golden Basins, and the Vails and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Siluer and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when hee had taken away all, hee departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Calasyria, iustificing his title by the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffly auctering, that this Prouince had not bene consigned ouer to the Egyptians, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achaeans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by severall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receiue their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers confirme themselves with intestine war, than by the terror of his armes, threatening destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weake estate, the younger almost ruinated by his inuasion, the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weake soeuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him awhile at Antioch, and then made a iourney vnto Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof hee presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioyning. This hee did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Solus frains eagerly demanded. Hercof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iason) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, he reprimed him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adioyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten milles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweete Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priuilege, from the holinesse of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathengods, I will not stand to discourse. Onely I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is farre lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to iudge this fearefull shift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore olde man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when he came to Onias, hee counselled him crasily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswaded him so come out of the Sanctuary; so he slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousness.  out the Citie, and in the same place where he had committed the wickednesse against Onias, he was slain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptoleme, a Traytor to Ptoleme Philometor, hee condemn'd innocent men to death; who iustly complained against Menelaw, and his brother Zys- machus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outrageous will, and not by any regard of iustice: since he reueng'd the death of Onias, yet slue thole that were to be in the same cause with Onias; who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should haue bene heard as innocent. By reason of such his vnsteadinesse, this King was commonly teamed Epimanes, that is, mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there scene throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, forty daies long, horsemen running in the counter, and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarcounting of God, all Histories haue deliuer'd vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a starr in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the Citie, after which there followed a slaughter like vnto this of Epiphanes,

When Linia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Linia caus'd this Hen to be carefully nurished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a faire encrease of white Poultry; and from the little Branch there sprang vp intime a Grove of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vse to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; & after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to be vnwor-thy of regard; it appears by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptoleme being left in Memphus, nor strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physon had not yet forgotten the terror of the former siege: the Alexan- drines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitie of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreame) since no thing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helps, and above all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in A- lexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein hee stood of his Vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out of Egypt with his armie; yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne

owne vse. This consideration wrought also with Physon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged:
 for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in answer to all Embassadors, yet he now prepar'd to make a sharpe warre vpon them both. And to this end hee presently furnished and sent out his Naue towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Calasyria, ready to enter Egypt the 10 Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Em-bassadours sent from Ptoleme. Their errand was partly to yeele thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather be pleased to signifie what hee required to haue done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Ant- iochus returned this short answer, That hee would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptoleme should surrender into his hands together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that hee should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for cure. For answer vnto these de-20 mands, hee set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recouered as well those places which appertained to Ptoleme in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphus, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hating now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie iour-neyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or, were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Anti- ochus seemed to take part with the iust cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it 30 would be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Persus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuerthelesse, the E- gyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing idlyntly in neede of helpe against their Vn-cle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable be-nefices should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had bene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Achaens attained. And by the like 40 helpe, had Rhodes bene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continuance of suitable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodians and Achaens, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeere since: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Achaens they desired in particular, that Lycortas the braue Warriour might be sent vnto them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, Generall of the Horse. Hercunto the Achaens readily condescended: and would immediately haue made performance, if Callicrates had not interposed his mischieuous art. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his ob-sequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Capitaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but withall their power, be ayding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeele vnto the Romans, what helpe soeuer should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Marius Zzzzz 2 the

the late Confull had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well be spared, to the ayde of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Achaens could without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand Souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callierates. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Marius, whereby the Achaens were desired to conformance themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadours to set Egypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeede sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde words, that no good thing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Achaens should doo any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybus and his friends, durst not gaine-say the Roman Council; which had force of an iunction. So the Kings were left in much distresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus ouercome: and then might the Embassadour sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had bene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto those Embassadours of Physcon and Cleopatra; which hauing stayed more then a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadours deliuered their message in the name of him that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philonor, no lesse than his Brother and Sister.

In this ambassage of Ptoleme, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had bene before three or foure yeeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Euleus, or Teneus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layd) which had the government of him, though his affaires in such good estate, that not onely hee determined to set vpon Antiochus, for Celestria; but would haue interposed himselfe betwene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that so his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to liue vnder protection of the time Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subjects, he might haue seemed to stand in no neede of such protection, he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister, shewed itselfe, even in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heads and bearded overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Olive. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell, groning and prostrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not so meane and mournfull, nor their looks and countenances so sadde and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Country stood; they made a pittifull and grievous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwaies remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vnder-taking vpon the King their Confederate; then would hee presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of Egypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vsed any delay; then should Ptoleme and Cleopatra, be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make reparaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenuis, C. Decimius and A. Hostilius, as Embassadours to determine and end the warre betwene those Kings. In commission they had first to finde King Ptoleme; and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that whelke they desired, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vsing delay. So these Romans together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, took their leave, and went on ward their way within three dayes after.

Whilst Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was he to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius; but Popilius filled it with a Rolle of papers, willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which hee held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after hee had stayed and pawed awhile, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe whatsoeuer the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling euerie particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Ierusalem after his returne; likewise as these things had rather bene historied then fore told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed awhile, and settled the Kingdome of Egypt, leaving it vnto the elder brother, and appointed the yonger to reigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they felt, as it had bene, in the power of the Egyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian ships.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Mithridates, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the warre.

BY this pre-emptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had bene well contented, a yeere before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Achaens and Aetolians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of faire little power than the King of Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed any menacing termes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallie Greeks, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bade him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. This hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee either approoued, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaimed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratius a Physician, whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had bene sent, recounting his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre, where withall hee forgot not to make of his brother as good mention as hee could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Enus and Maronea might be bestowed subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes; not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happye that Countreie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach. That * God is the fittest and sharpest schoolmaster that can be deuised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controule to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoiles; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Siluer carried by Paulus into the Roman treasure, that from thenceforth, vntill the ciuill Wars which followed vpon the death of Iulius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue bin hindred by the souldiors; who grudged at their General, for not hauing dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by seuerall exhortations. Thus Paulus enioyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuerthelesse, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died five daies before the Triumph; the other three daies after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the ioy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About the same time, Octavianus the Admirall, who had brought Perses out of Siam (mother: and Anicinus the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their feuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enough to fyll vnto Rome, Sunne superfluous, Take vpon thee the Maieslie, that thy deserts haue purchased.

BY this which wee haue already set downe, is scene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. Wee haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field; hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaues shall fall off; her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, haue bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which haue bin preferred, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragickall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and mozt of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Infallibilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, these great Lords of the world haue beene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrius proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge. Which was it otherwise, and the extreame ill bargain of buying this lasting discourse, vnderstood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather haue wished, to haue stolne out of the world without noyse; than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltie: by giuing in spoyle the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sorts of forrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germans, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath bene no State fearefull in the East, but that of

of the Turk; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the *Moor*es out of Granada, haue made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoysed by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as haue bene spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defenseless Warre, and in diuisions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeeres, or three at the most, they may not onely be perswaded to lue in peace, but all their swelling and ouer-flowing streames may bee brought backe into their naturall channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof: the one to ioynen all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath bene already said; That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwaies laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwaies transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the experience in themselves. They neglect the aduice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all his words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beloued; God, which hath made him and loues him, is alwaies detested. I haue considered (saith Salomon) all the workes that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, and vexation of spirit: but who be leaues it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the first, made him enioyne his sonne Phillip to restore Nauarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that iustice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres; which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepassed happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the gawell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iust, and mighty Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou onely hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the faire stretched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hic iacet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it selfe, The first part of the General Historie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and haue hewne out; besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspeakable and neuer enough lamented losse, hath taught mee to say with Iob, Verba feci in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

To the Reader.

The use of Chronological Tables is needfull to all Historians, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot, like Annals, yearly set downe all Occurrences not coherent. This heere following, may serue as an Index to the present Part of this worke; pointing vnto the severall matters, that hauing fallen out at one time, are farre disteined in the Relation. Certainly it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that any can be. For howe soeuer the yeeres of the first Patriarchs may seeme to haue been well-neere compleat, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, many frictions, and the least yeere, or yeeres, of one King reckoned also as the ymost of another. The same is most likely to haue fallen out in manye other; though not precisely recorded. Heere to may be added the diuerse and imperfect formes of the yee, which were in use among sundry Nations: causing the extreme confusion in the reckning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse out of so many, and utterly disagreeing computations, as haue already gotten authoritie, what may probablye held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleged, in excuse of such rraur as a more intencine and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde heerein. It miserieue to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane iudgement) from any notorious Anachronisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, euen in that regard; not onely for some errors of the presse, in the numbring of yeeres, but yf some haste mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to haue here by reformed, yf hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The Titles over the Columnes, haue reference to that which followes vnder them; as will readily be conceiued. Where to Titles, or more, are ouer the head, as <sup>some</sup> <sup>names</sup> there doe the numbers vnderneath answere proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ierusalem were finished in the 319. yeere from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be vnderstood, That Iehosaphat beganne his reigne in the 3774. of the Iulian Aera, in the 3092. of the World, & in the 99. yeere of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much, so those that are acquainted with works of this kinde. To auoid prolixitie, I haue forborne to insert these yeeres, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reigne; some change of Gouvernement; some Battaille fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeeres wherein Syllius Capetus reigned ouer the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betwene the 4. of Iehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, vnto the 17. wherein Syllius Auentinus succeeded, and wherein Iehoram first reigned with Iehosaphat his father. For I thought it vaine to haue filled up a page with 12 lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Auentinus, and the 17. of Iehosaphat. In setting downe the Kings, there is noted ouer the head of every one, what place he held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fift, seuenth, or so forth, in ranke, of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeere of his reigne; at the end, or foot of the name (as the space giues leaue) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned; in the spaces following vnderneath are those yeeres of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeere of any remarkable accident.
